We are endeavoring to establish a permanent basis for this travel allowance, at a point which will more nearly meet the costs, and we are endeavoring to make sure the rural carrier does not have the fear of dismissal hanging over his head every day of the year. We are trying to give him some security.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I am in full sympathy with the able argument which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has made. I should like to know what special compensation is provided for those carriers whose routes are more than 30 miles?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Those that have routes more than 30 miles in length receive $20 for each mile per year in excess of 30 miles. At present it is $30, and this is a cut of $10 per mile per year.

Mr. HASTINGS. What will a rural carrier get who serves a route under 30 miles after the enactment of this bill?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is figured out at $60 a mile. On a 10-mile route his regular pay would be $600. If the reduction amounts to more than $180 it stops at $180 under an amendment authorized by the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. May I say a word in answer to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois in reference to curtailing service to patrons of rural routes by citing an example? I know of one consolidation in my own county where they cut out one rural carrier. They previously had 4 and now they have 3. The route was extended mostly on the route of one carrier. I know that one farmer who formerly had his mail delivered right to his door now has to walk a mile and a half to get it. Two of his neighbors had their mail delivered previously to their farms and now they have to travel a mile to get their mail, and there are two more that have nearly a half mile to go to their mail boxes. This goes to show that every time there is a consolidation of mail routes there is some curtailment in service at the same time resulting in a detriment to the rural patrons.

Mr. DOBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DOBBINS. That may be true in the locality to which the gentleman refers, but does he know that on the 1st day of July 1932 there were nearly 7,000,000 families receiving rural delivery service and notwithstanding the reduction of the number of routes throughout the country the total mileage of the routes had increased by 3,271 miles because the old routes were made longer and the aggregate length was increased under the rearrangement of the routes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I understand; and the committee has considered that phase of it. May I say that I agree with the able chairman of the committee and also with the able gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] in what they have already said about this bill. They are experts on postal and postal-employee legislation.

The rural carriers in wanting the passage of this legislation are not asking for anything that is unfair. They desire to be secure in their positions. They only ask a fair salary with a fair and reasonable expenditure allowance. The committee has carefully considered this bill and has reviewed every phase of it before bringing it out on the floor today. The committee has sought information from all sources, and in establishing the mileage rate now contained in this bill it was found that the 6-cent-a-mile rate was fair and that in use by private companies with equipment very much similar as that used by the rural carriers.

The carriers are forced to take almost a $3,000,000 salary loss by the passage of H.R. 8919, but they are faced with the cold reality of either accepting the salary adjustment embodied in this measure or seeing 9,500 of their fellow carriers dismissed from the service, through a wholesale consolidation of routes by the Post Office Department. This bill will provide the rural carriers with assurance against dismissal. It provides against any indiscriminate or wholesale letting out of rural carriers. It makes it impossible for the Post Office Department to consolidate thousands of rural routes and release from employment a like number of carriers.

The committee has felt that the rural carriers had suffered a real set-back in fair earnings when their mileage allowances were slashed by Executive bulletin, following the passage of the Economy Act, to 1 cent a mile. This reduction in allowance, coupled with the 15-percent cut under the Economy Act, placed practically all of the carriers in a most unfair condition.

The rural carriers are daily serving more than 25,000,000 people in the conduct of their duties, and to curtail this service by the dismissal of 9,500 employees would mean the elimination of decent rural service to thousands of people who are entitled to get rural free delivery. They are as much entitled to daily mail service as those persons residing in the cities. They are just as much entitled to as close a contact with the other sections, both with their own community as well as other parts of the country, as the residents of villages and cities. Why deny them such service? If the Post Office Department is facing a deficit why should the rural carriers be made to shoulder the burden?

In the first place, this Department has never paid its way, except during the year in which the Economy Act was in operation, and then only at the expense of the employees in that Department, and if the air and ship subsidies are considered, they would still be in the red. Each employee was trimmed of part of his wages, wages which should never have been sliced. The salary of the rural carrier is not high. He is not able to put away each month any amount from his earnings, nor will he after this bill is passed. No; on the contrary, the rural carrier as a general rule spends his entire monthly salary, and where is it spent? I would say that, without an exception, his wages go into the merchant's cash drawer of his own community. He buys everything locally, and the community as a whole benefits from the salary of the rural carrier.

The argument has been raised by Members of Congress that the rural carrier should be cut in salary and mileage because he competes with his neighbor in other employment. In answer to that I would say that no rural carrier—and this is Department order—can enter into any competitive employment of any kind. This regulation is strictly and rigidly enforced, and I do not believe that there are any violations of this Department order.

The 25,000,000 rural-route patrons now being served by the rural carriers with this service will be gratified to hear of the passage of this bill. It means that their mail delivery service will be guaranteed and protected, and it will mean that they will not have to adjust themselves to changes which the Post Office Department could make without taking into consideration what effect it would have on the people being served by these routes.

The rural carrier travels over every kind of road in every kind of weather. He is faced with the task of serving the patrons of his route in all seasons and under all conditions. His salary is not being increased by the passage of this bill; as a matter of fact, it is decreased, but what it does is to guarantee him in his position so that he need not be under the constant and everlasting fear of finding himself without a job because of a widespread consolidation of routes that the Post Office Department might wish to invoke. This bill merely adjusts his salary.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, the Chairman of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee [Mr. MEAD] is deserving of commendation for the excellent piece of legislation that he and the other members of the committee prepared for our consideration. I know these men are very much interested in the underpaid rural letter carriers and all other Federal employees.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the time has come when the representatives of our Government should discontinue the economy program, because of which thousands of men and women have been dismissed from their positions.

The other day I stated on the floor of the House that I was a member of the Labor Committee, and when this committee was holding public hearings on the 5-day, 6-hour bill many officials of our industries appeared before our committee in opposition to the bill. I asked these men, "Do you have an age limit in your plant?" I was informed by them that the age limit was 40 to 45 years.

Now, Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, we will never get out of a depression unless we are able to find employment for men and women who are physically and mentally able to work.

I am going to repeat a statement I made here some time ago. I said that if we Members of the House would permit ourselves to be actuated by humanitarian motives instead of selfish ones, we could solve any problem which would confront us. [Applause.]

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to my colleague on the committee [Mr. ROMJUE].

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Chairman, there are three points involved in this legislation and three only.

First is the base-pay proposition. As has been stated, the base-pay proposition of $1,800 per year is now made to apply on a mileage of 30 miles. Previously it was on the basis of 24 miles.

The second proposition involved in the bill is the equipment allowance. Under the present law we have an allowance of 4 cents a mile. This bill makes the equipment allowance 6 cents a mile. I call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that in many sections of the country some rural carriers have to maintain vehicles and horses; and, strange as it may seem, in all the testimony that has ever come before the Post Office Committee and in all the testimony that has come before the Post Office Department bearing on the proposition of equipment allowance, nowhere have the figures been officially submitted bearing on what it costs to maintain a horse and vehicle. We took all this into consideration, as in some sections of the country equipment of this kind has to be kept in addition to automobile.

The third proposition involved in the bill is the matter of consolidation. This is the same as the present law, except that this bill provides that there cannot be any dismissal except for resignation, death, retirement, or dismissal on charges. Taking this altogether, this bill, if enacted into law, will save something over $3,000,000 to the Government.

Mr. McDUFFIE. May I ask the gentleman whether the rural carriers are in favor of this bill?

Mr. ROMJUE. Of course the rural carriers are not entirely satisfied with the bill, but they realize the situation the country is in and are willing to do their share to assist recovery.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I am sure they cannot be. I understood this morning they were. I could not understand how they would be in favor of a bill which would take from them $3,000,000.

Mr. ROMJUE. I will explain the situation to the gentleman. Every member of this committee worked diligently and painstakingly on this matter. And this bill comes to the House unanimously agreed upon.

I do not remember the exact number, but there have been something like 7,000 reductions in the personnel of the rural mail service. The Department, of course, wanted to be as economical as possible, and they felt that unless there was some legislation on this matter they might have to make further considerations and bring about dismissals in order to keep within the revenue of the Department.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Does this bill prevent any further consolidations regardless of whether the Department thinks that advisable or not?

Mr. ROMJUE. The consolidations that have taken place heretofore, mainly, have been where there was a death or resignation or dismissal on charges or a retirement, and that is what this bill provides.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Then there is no change in that respect.

Mr. ROMJUE. No change, except we are enacting that into law, whereas that is done under regulations at the present time.

Mr. McDUFFIE. In other words, you are writing the regulations into law.

Mr. ROMJUE. We are writing the regulations into law, and, so far as I know, the regulations of the Department have never gone beyond what I have stated, but the Department said they might have to dismiss a lot of these people, and the first proposition in this bill reduces the letter carrier's salary 25 percent on the basis of a base pay of $1,800 for 24 miles. His mileage is increased to 30 miles. So he takes a 25-percent reduction in that respect, figured on the basis of the length of the 30-mile route.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. ROMJUE. The standard now, instead of being 24 miles, is increased to 30 miles, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROMJUE. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. Is the provision with respect to equipment-maintenance allowance increased from 4 cents to 6 cents upon the initiative of the committee or upon the protest of the rural mail carriers?

Mr. ROMJUE. No; the committee listened to everybody who desired to be heard, and we had testimony from various sources as to what the equipment allowance should be. There were plenty of people who thought it ought to be 7 or 8 cents and the committee used what we thought was our best judgment and tried to do justice both to the Government and to those who are in the service.

Mr. ADAMS. Was there any general complaint among the carriers that a rate of 4 cents is insufficient?

Mr. ROMJUE. Yes; it was almost universal.

Mr. COLDEN and Mr. DONDERO rose.

Mr. ROMJUE. I yield first to the gentleman from California.

Mr. COLDEN. I want to ask the gentleman this question, bringing out a comparison of the wages of the rural carrier with the rural teacher. Every rural route goes past several school buildings in the country where teachers are probably laboring for 8 months at a salary of from $40 to $60 a month. Does not the gentleman believe that is an inconsistent salary in comparison with the rural mail carrier?

Mr. ROMJUE. I may say to the gentleman that we cannot go into every issue that may come up of that kind. We are trying to legislate on this particular problem and, of course, we will never get everybody equalized, and for that reason we did not go into that problem.

Mr. DONDERO. Does the committee justify the reduction in salary by the increase in mileage or by the increase in the pay per mile for his vehicle?

Mr. ROMJUE. No; as I said a moment ago, there was never any estimate about the operation of vehicles or the cost of feeding horses or anything of that kind, but there is a general belief that the roads have been improved; yet, as the chairman has said, improved roads in many sections of the country do not mean very much to the rural carrier, for the reason that the rural carrier goes into the country and does not follow the main highway, because all improved concrete roads run practically on a straight line, and rural routes run mostly in a circle, coming back to the starting point with as little duplication in travel as possible.

Mr. DONDERO. And all the people do not live on the improved highways.

Mr. ROMJUE. No; and the rural mail carrier has to travel in a sort of circle. He may, of course, cross an improved highway now and then, but he does not travel straight down the highway like a tourist.

Mr. DONDERO. Have the rural carriers expressed their approval of this bill and are they satisfied with it?

Mr. ROMJUE. I do not know that anybody is ever satisfied with anything, and I cannot say that, but the committee, or at least the other members of the committee, used all the judgment they had to do what they thought was due the Government in the way of economy, and at the same time they tried to deal as fairly as they could with the employees under the circumstances.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, in view of some of the things that have come up today, I wish to make a brief statement about the consolidation situation.

According to my information, the consolidations that have been made so far are averaging at the present time a saving of about $1,200 per consolidation; but these consolidations almost altogether come from forced 30-year retirements, so that the additional expense to the Government on account of retirement is $1,000 a year and therefore the net saving, after you deduct the retirement cost, is only about $200 per consolidation.

There are a couple of things about the bill itself that I want to ask some questions about. The first one is this: On page 2 it appears that the carrier with 30 miles receives a salary of $1,800 for 6 days a week, and I would like to ask the chairman of the committee by what provision of law, Is anything less than the $1,800 paid to the carrier who carries mail only 3 days a week? I am wondering if this section requires an amendment to take care of that situation?

Mr. MEAD. No; a carrier who carries two triweekly routes of 40 miles each is paid at the rate of a carrier who carries 6 days a week on a route half the combined mileage of the two triweekly routes.

Mr. TABER. Is there authority of law for that?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; he is listed as a carrier who carries two triweekly routes and is paid the same as a carrier who carries one route 6 days a week.

Mr. TABER. I would like to ask the gentleman one other question. There are a number of roads in my territory that serve a section with a large population where the carrier is obliged to spend almost the full 8 hours of the time and some of the time, more, in getting over his route. These routes are not much more than the present standard of 24 miles. That would reduce these carriers substantially, would it not?

Mr. MEAD. We have an amendment to cover that. It will take care of the short routes. After we had the estimate furnished by the Department we found out that rural carriers whose routes are 7 to 20 miles were reduced in some instances in excess of $400, an unwarranted reduction, so we have an amendment covering the short routes in which we limit the reduction so that it will not exceed $180.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not true that most of these carriers necessarily, where their routes are extended, require a substitute carrier or someone to assist them?

Mr. MEAD. That may be true in the winter season and during the holidays, and in some cases the Department adds an auxiliary carrier.

Mr. DOWELL. And the carrier has to pay that substitute or assistant out of his own pocket.

Mr. MEAD. Any help provided by the rural carrier is paid for by the carrier, and it is no added expense to the Department. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I am tremendously interested in this bill. I heartily approve of the bill and believe that it is just and fair.

I represent a district in which the routes have great mileage, and, although they have good roads, in the fall and wintertime there are, as there always have been, quantities of mud. The bill is apparently well justified, and if there is any injustice it is the amount paid to the carrier and not to the Government of the United States.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I have only one more speaker, and I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DOBBINS].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Illinois 4 minutes.

Mr. DOBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words about some of the inquiries, not all of them audible over this hall, but many of them questions that have come to me privately here at this desk, with reference to a comparison between alleged lower costs of operating ordinary motor vehicles and this allowance we are making for a motor vehicle used in the rural mail service. Gentlemen making that comparison lose sight of the fact that as they employ their own motor vehicles, they frequently drive them 200 or 300 miles a day, traveling on the best of improved roads, whereas the rural carrier in the performance of his service uses the vehicle on an average only 30 miles a day, and travels over roads of all conditions and descriptions. They lose sight of the fact also that the rural carrier has to perform his work on schedule and cannot wait for good weather nor for good roads.

He starts out at exactly the same hour every day, no matter whether it is raining or snowing or what the weather is and regardless of what the condition of his roads may be. He must frequently equip the wheels of his vehicle with tire chains, and the testimony before us showed that the average rural carrier wears out many sets of chains in the course of a year in his battles with mud, snow, and ice. He is obliged to attend to his vehicle and equipment after returning to his home, often requiring hours for this work, and that is probably overlooked by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DURGAN] in commenting upon the time they spend in their work. A good many people think that a rural carrier is working for us only when he is traveling. He must go to the post office and assemble his mail and route it in the order of its intended delivery. He must attend to numerous other postal transactions with the patrons of the route, and when he has traveled over his route, he must take care of his collected mail in the post office, take his vehicle home and put it in condition for punctual and efficient service on the following day.

There is another feature that we must consider. The rural carrier heretofore has been making up a considerable part of his equipment allowance, or the expense for which his equipment allowance is designed, out of his salary, yet the public have been looking upon him as receiving that salary net for his services. Few rural carriers in the past, with the small equipment allowances they have had, have been able to avoid dipping deeply into their salaries to supplement their inadequate expense allowance. Often $300 or $400 a year has had to be taken by a carrier out of his salary to pay for his equipment expense, which the meager allowance heretofore made is inadequate to cover. This new provision is fair to the carrier, because it allocates to him as salary only that which is intended to compensate him for the work that he does, and provides an equipment allowance that is actually required for that purpose.

Mr. DURGAN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOBBINS. I am glad to yield to my friend the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. DURGAN of Indiana. I know the committee has not investigated dairies, but within the last 30 days—and I hope the chairman of the committee will listen to this—a rural carrier's neighbors made complaint that he works 2 hours a day and runs a dairy the balance of the time.

Mr. DOBBINS. I do not believe there is a rural carrier in the United States who devotes as little as 2 hours a day to the Postal Service.

Mr. DURGAN of Indiana. I have turned that complaint in to the postal authorities, and I wish the chairman would read those letters.

Mr. MEAD. I will help the gentleman get rid of him if necessary.

Mr. DURGAN of Indiana. He is a good Republican, as 90 percent of them are.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DOBBINS] is immensely interested in rural carriers. Nevertheless, in all fairness, I ask him whether he does not think that an equipment allowance of 5 cents should be made instead of 6 cents?

Mr. DOBBINS. I am sorry indeed that the expiration of all time under the rule prevents my replying to my distinguished colleague the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) the first paragraph of section 8 of the act entitled "An act reclassifying the salaries of postmasters and employees of the Postal Service, readjusting their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, increasing postal rates to provide for such readjustment, and for other purposes", approved February 28, 1925, as amended (U.S.C., title 39, sec. 197), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 8. The salary of carriers in the rural mail delivery service for serving a rural route of 30 miles 6 days a week shall be $1,800; on routes less than 30 miles, $60 per mile per annum for each mile or major fraction thereof. Each rural carrier assigned to a route served 6 days in a week shall receive $20 per mile per annum for each mile or major fraction thereof said route is in excess of 30 miles, based on actual mileage, and each rural carrier assigned to a route served 3 days in the week shall receive $10 per mile per annum for each mile or major fraction thereof said route is in excess of 30 miles, based on actual mileage."

(b) The second paragraph of such section 8 (U.S.C., title 39, sec. 200) is amended to read as follows:

"Deductions for failure to perform service on a standard rural-delivery route for 30 miles and less shall not exceed the rate of pay per mile for service for 30 miles and less; and deductions for failure to perform service on mileage in excess of 30 miles shall not exceed the rate of compensation allowed for such excess mileage."

(c) The third paragraph of such section 8 (relating to equipment-maintenance allowance for rural carriers) (U.S.C., title 39, sec 206) is amended by striking out "4 cents" and inserting in lieu thereof "6 cents."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 22, after the word "cents" insert: "Such allowance shall not be changed except pursuant to law enacted after the date this act takes effect."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WILLFORD: Page 2, line 22, after the word "thereof" strike out "6 cents", and insert "5 cents."

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order because this amendment has just been adopted by the committee. A motion to strike it out is not now in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WILLFORD. Mr. Chairman, before we grant 6 cents a mile for equipment allowance let us consider the practice in private industry. The big companies of the country which employ salesmen who travel across the country by automobile allow but 4 cents and 4½ cents a mile. Out in our country we have hard-surfaced roads.

I have listened to the controversy provoked when the gentleman from Indiana said some carriers worked an hour to an hour and a half a day. I know that to be a fact in some places in my country.

Mr. DURGAN of Indiana. So do I.

Mr. WILLFORD. I know cases of rural carriers where they say their wives carry the mail for them and that it took only an hour or an hour and a half and that it took only 30 minutes to fix the mail. As I say, we have hard surfaced roads, fine gravel roads, all-weather roads.

I think 5 cents a mile is ample allowance, for if the carriers took any human kind of care of their cars at all they would not need to buy a new car every 3 years.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLFORD. I yield.

Mr. DUNN. The gentleman states there are rural carriers who work for an hour and a half or 2 hours a day. Does the gentleman know how many rural carriers work 5, 6, and 7 hours a day?

Mr. WILLFORD. I have never gone into the matter far enough to know the number, but I do know positively of one rural carrier with whom I am very closely acquainted.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLFORD. I yield.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Does the gentleman realize that rural carriers are compelled to buy more tires and that they have more engine trouble and more clutch trouble than the ordinary driver, because the rural carriers have to make frequent stops and are frequently obliged to run off the hard road onto rough shoulders?

Mr. WILLFORD. I have listened to the rural carriers' talk until I have come to the conclusion that they are little tin gods favored above all others and that they have misused their privileges. In my country rural carriers receive from $2,400 to $3,600 a year. They receive greater compensation than the postmaster who accepts the responsibility. Not only that, but they are doing a wonderful lot of political activity in my country.

Mr. DURGAN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLFORD. I yield.

Mr. DURGAN of Indiana. How many Democrats are there among them?

Mr. WILLFORD. Not one that I know of; not one. I repeat, 5 cents a mile is sufficient allowance. I drive a car myself as many miles as the average rural carrier drives his, and it does not cost me any 6 cents a mile; and I drive a car for 5 years before I get a new one.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLFORD. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact that the Federal Government has spent millions upon millions of dollars improving the roads, that the States and counties have spent vast sums of money, and the roads have been so improved that it does not cost as much to drive a car today as it did in years gone by?

Mr. WILLFORD. We have spent hundreds of millions of dollars in Iowa alone in the building and improving of roads to help the rural mail carrier. That was the plea on which the roads were built; that was the cry, "Help the rural carriers."

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLFORD. I yield.

Mr. BEITER. Is it not a fact that practically every garage and activity connected with the use of automobiles has adopted a code which increases the cost of the maintenance of cars and that that is reflected in this rate?

Mr. WILLFORD. No; most of the rural carriers repair their own cars.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLFORD. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Does the gentleman take into consideration the high cost of gasoline? In Florida they pay a tax of 8 cents a gallon, 7 cents of which goes to the State and 1 cent to the Federal Government.

Mr. WILLFORD. In Iowa we are paying 14 cents a gallon.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I may add further, if the gentleman will permit, that in my section of the country for several years the mail carrier had to drive across my plowed fields for half a mile because the roads were blocked by snow.

Mr. WILLFORD. Under the rules of the Post Office Department when the roads are blocked the mail carrier is not compelled to travel his route.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLFORD. I yield.

Mr. MILLARD. Is the gentleman a member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads?

Mr. WILLFORD. I am not.

Mr. MILLARD. Does the gentleman want to put his individual opinion against that of the whole committee?

Mr. WILLFORD. At least I have the right to state conditions as I know them to be in my part of the country.

Mr. MILLARD. Does the gentleman know what testimony was presented before the committee?

Mr. WILLFORD. No; I do not. But I still maintain I have the right to state my own observations and opinion.

Mr. DURGAN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLFORD. I yield.

Mr. DURGAN of Indiana. The gentleman's knoweldge is practical, obtained from close association with the rural carriers?

Mr. WILLFORD. Absolutely. The rural carriers are organized. They came here in a body to sell their goods, and they have sold them to the committee. The other fellow was not heard; there were millions and millions who were not even considered because they were not organized. The carriers are like a lot of frogs in a swamp; they make a lot of noise.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute amendment offered by Mr. McDUFFIE to the amendment of Mr. WILLFORD: Strike out the figure "5" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "4."

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment, if adopted, would mean nothing at all. There is a provision in the bill which states that the law is amended by striking out "4 cents" and inserting in lieu thereof "6 cents." The adoption of this amendment would make that provision read "strike out '4 cents' and insert in lieu thereof "4 cents.'"

Mr. McDUFFIE. No. The gentleman did not understand the substitute I offered. There is an amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILLFORD] to strike out "6" and insert "5." I am offering an amendment to strike out the "5" and insert "4." I am suggesting the old rate, a difference of 2 cents under what the committee has reported. The language in the line can, of course, be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. Insofar as the parliamentary procedure is concerned, the Chair holds that the amendment is in order and overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, in nowise would I assume to know more about this subject than do the very fine gentlemen who have given it hours of study. I have just read the letter written the committee by the Postmaster General, and I am sure he has given quite as much thought and study to this problem as has the committee because he is dealing with this subject as closely and directly as the committee has done.

The Postmaster General suggested that 4 cents a mile should be given as an allowance to rural carriers in lieu of what they are now receiving under the provisions of the Economy Act.

I recognize that the rural-carrier service is a very fine service. The personnel of that service is far above the average; indeed some of our best citizens are rural carriers. I appreciate the fact also that it is not a popular thing to stand in a legislative body and incur the displeasure of that great organization of some 40,000 men throughout the Nation who have their influence and their power. This is just one more instance of the power of an organized minority under our form of government. It is not a very happy thing to take a position that is not approved by that very active and fine organization.

The rural carrier in America today, and I say this without fear of successful contradiction, is the best-paid individual on the Government pay roll in proportion to amount of real work done. Five and one quarter hours per day is the average work done by the rural carrier. Roads have been improved, and the work is less arduous from year to year. There are thousands of people, yes, hundreds of thousands, who would be delighted to have an opportunity to serve the Government as rural carriers. No injustice would be done by giving them their allowance which was granted, I think, in 1925, and which was eliminated under the Economy Act, and it is proper for Congress to follow the suggestion of the Postmaster General and give them back the 4 cents per mile. I think gentlemen are not very sure of their ground when they say they cannot operate their vehicles on an allowance of 6 cents per mile.

I think it is unfortunate indeed if, in our admiration and respect for this great organization, we permit ourselves to lose sight of our better judgment and pay these employees more in proportion for the work they do than any other Government employee by and large. I submit that 4 cents per mile is not an unreasonably low figure.

I realize that you gentlemen are not going to adopt this amendment. I have no doubt that the House is going through with this program, but I have risen to take a few moments of your time to suggest that you are going beyond the recommendations made by the head of the Post Office Department in this allowance. In the light of these times of unemployment, I feel the average rural carrier should thank God for his job. He can, in many instances, finish his carrier service in time to work every day on his farm or do other things outside the Government service. Instead of urging more pay and allowance the carrier in these times should be very happy and feel himself a most fortunate citizen. The carriers have been my friends. It is not pleasing to me to oppose their program at any time. This committee has not followed the suggestions of the Postmaster General, who feels that economies must be effected to come within the Budget figures. No one wishes to curtail our splendid mail service. The Postmaster General has not done so where he could avoid it. We must not forget that funds expended for this service must come from the taxpayers. This bill repeals the Economy Act as it applied to the carriers. I realize it may be popular here to repeal that act, but the taxpayer will some day be heard from. We too often forget that he is the man who pays for all Government service.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think we are exaggerating just a little bit when we say that the rural carriers of America are favored above any of the Federal employees. We do not take into consideration, and I take it from the statement the gentleman has just made that he has not taken into consideration, the fact that rural carriers must spend some money to do the job that they are performing for this Government. I do not believe that the 6-cents-a-mile equipment allowance is too much. In addition to operating a pleasure car I have employed men in my business to operate automobiles. These men drive the best roads of the country, and it costs more than 6 cents per mile. This is not true with rural carriers. They are traveling the worst roads of this country. I know some rural carriers that work 2 and 2½ hours a day when the weather is good. I have in my home town a fine fellow who carries mail in an old model T Ford. He has not been able to buy a new car because of the equipment allowance that is coming to him. That fellow has gone out at 9:30 in the morning and arrived back at 8 o'clock in the evening during the month of March.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Maybe he had to work a half hour to get the thing started in the morning.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Chairman, I know it is a popular proposition these days to find fault with the Federal employees, but I think it is all wrong. It is true that men want these jobs today, but they did not want the jobs years ago when the present incumbents went into service. The average time that these men have served in the Rural Free Delivery Service is a little more than 14 years. Some of these men are getting up in years. They have done a good job, and they have built up a service that is appreciated by the people in the rural sections of America. I think we should do nothing to tear down that great service.

I do not believe that they can operate their automobiles over the bad roads of this country for less than 6 cents a mile. The fact of the matter is I have some figures here which show that the average cost throughout the Nation to operate an automobile in the Rural Free Delivery Service is a little over 8½ cents a mile, and in the State of Texas the figures show it costs 13 cents a mile to operate automobiles in the Rural Free Delivery Service of that State.

This talk of all the men working 2 and 3 hours a day is an exaggeration. The average time that is put in by these men is almost 7½ hours a day. Of course you can take isolated cases and point to one or two rural carriers working 1½ or 2 hours a day, but we should not judge the entire service by an isolated case or two. In Pennsylvania we boast of having the finest roads of any State in the Union. We have a program on now for the building of 50,000 miles of roads in Pennsylvania. We built more than 13,000 miles of roads in that State in the last 2 years. Notwithstanding this fact, our rural carriers are traveling the mud roads and the upkeep expense of their cars is tremendous.

Here is one of the finest chaps I have ever known. He has a 41-mile route, serving 2,001 patrons. He has 499 families on his route. His salary is $2,310. His maintenance allowance at the rate of 4 cents a mile is $477 less 15 percent. During the year from July 1, 1932, to June 30, 1933, he received a salary of $2,226.98. His maintenance costs amounted to 6.3 cents a mile to operate his car. He covered 11,960 miles and his total maintenance cost for the year was $753.48.

Mr. HAINES. Now subtract this from his total amount received and you will find that this fellow received a net salary of $1,473.50. A city letter carrier working 8 hours a day receives $2,100, and this is not too much, but when Members stand here on the floor and claim that our rural carriers are the "best paid men in the service", they make statements that they cannot substantiate with facts. Deduct from this amount the depreciation of a car, which is several hundred dollars a year, his insurance, his liability costs, you will find that this carrier is not overpaid; and Mr. Chairman, this is but one of thousands of similar experiences in the ranks of the rural carriers. I know no finer type of men in the Government service. They give this service with a smile, and while there may be a few cases where these men have easy jobs and do things politically that are unethical, and engage in business on the side, this is the exception and a rare one indeed. I do not think that we should find fault with this great group of faithful Government employees for the mistakes of a few. I have many letters from these men who give me their cost experience, and after deducting this from the total paid them, they are not the best paid men in the service, but I believe I am safe in saying that they are among the lowest paid of our employees, when we know the true situation among these men. We want our employees to be well paid. The trouble right now in this country is that we have too many underpaid men and women and surely this great Government of ours should set the right example. If we do not set such an example we have no right to ask private industry to do so. Another fact has been overlooked by those who appear to find fault with this 6 cents equipment allowance and that is that most of these men must call in auxiliary help, indeed 35 percent of the carriers are forced to do this. These men are not paid by the Department, but by the carriers themselves. Clerks and city and village carriers are not asked to do this. The rural carriers' working day is divided into four parts:

First he must spend time keeping his equipment in good condition.

He has a car to keep running or a horse to feed, many times both. He must spend part of his day sorting his mail, casing his mail in the post office; then he goes out on his route. When he returns he must again do a varying amount of clerical work in connection with the responsibilities that are his in the performance of his work and the fine service he wants to give to his patrons. Mr. Chairman, 6 cents is not too much equipment allowance. If we are to deduct 25 percent from the base pay of these men in the changing of the base pay upon the basis of 30 miles instead of 24 miles, we are working a hardship upon these men; but to reduce their equipment allowance below that called for in this bill, and unanimously approved by the committee, is unfair, to say the least. Mr. Chairman, I know most of the rural carriers in my own district. I say to you here and now that we have no finer group of employees in the Government service. I am proud to be listed as their friend. I am as much interested in economy in the affairs of the Government as any Member in this body, but I do not believe in economizing at the expense of faithful employees. I think that private industry admits that the greatest blunder they made in the past was the ridiculous reduction of wages, which contributed so much to our economic ills of this present day. Will not we profit by that mistake, Mr. Chairman?

Would it not be a grave error to take more from these men than we now propose to do in the enactment of this legislation? The saving of more than $3,000,000 will meet with the approval of our people, but such a saving will not be looked upon with favor by the great host of public-spirited Americans, if by doing so we cripple an established service that is giving such wonderful service to our rural communities. I ask, Mr. Chairman and Members of this committee, that you vote down the amendment to reduce the equipment allowance to 4 cents and to also vote against reducing the equipment allowance to 5 cents. Stand by the committee, who gave serious and long study to this bill, and who come to you feeling that it is a fair and just measure, meriting the approval of the entire Membership of Congress.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending amendment do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The substitute amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MEAD: Page 2, at the end of section 1, insert the following new subsection (d):

"In the case of any carrier in the Rural Mail Delivery Service on the date this act takes effect who serves 6 days a week a rural route of less than 30 miles or who serves 3 days a week a rural route of less than 60 miles, or two routes of a combined length of less than 60 miles, the annual salary of such carrier shall not be reduced more than $180 by operation of subsection (a) of this section."

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, in explanation of the amendment I may say that it prevents a reduction in excess of $180 per annum on the short routes. Many of them will be eliminated as quickly as possible; but were it not for this amendment the salary on some of the short routes would be reduced in the neighborhood of $400 and no one wanted to do that. I therefore ask for the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOEPPEL: Page 2, line 10, strike out period and insert a colon and add: "Provided, That no reduction in salary shall apply under this section wherever the carriers in the Rural Service serve over 500 legitimate patrons on routes of 24 miles or less."

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and print them in the RECORD in a subsequent edition.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, after 8 years' experience as postmaster I am satisfied that the deficit which only too often exists in the Post Office Department is more or less chargeable to the Congress which, under the stimulus of political expediency, in some instances ties the hands of the post-office administration and in others is perhaps indifferent or illiberal. The Post Office Department is handicapped in the efficient conduct of business to a great extent due to the fact that it is subservient to the whim of 531 politicians who, apparently, are, as a whole, more concerned as to their political futures than in revising and modernizing the largest department in the Government.

That the Post Office Department itself is culpable in some respects is illustrated in this bill now under discussion. The fact that the Post Office Department has permitted the various inequalities pertaining to rural carriers to exist without suitable recommendation to the Congress for their correction would indicate that the Post Office Department officials are sympathetic toward the archaic procedure of the oxcart or pony-express days, notwithstanding that we have progressed to the days of the air mail with its expeditious and very satisfactory service.

It is my opinion that any competent business man could take over the functions of the office of Postmaster General if freed from the influence of politics and its concomitant ills, and through the adoption of modern, efficient methods, could improve the service immeasurably and at the same time save the taxpayers millions of dollars annually.

Outwardly the Post Office Department has every appearance of efficiency, but in its internal administration there are many glaring examples of inefficiency which no corporation would permit to exist. During the days I served as postmaster I was continually calling the attention of the Department to the unbusinesslike methods forced upon the various postmasters and the personnel which, if corrected, would have resulted in improvements in the service with lesser expenditures.

My time is too limited to go into extensive details on the subject, but a few illustrations will suffice to indicate the type of discriminations, extravagances, and inefficiency which is so costly to the American taxpayers and so unfair to our post-office personnel.

For instance, the postmaster of a third-class office whose sales are $7,999 per annum receives a limited clerical allowance, and at the same time he must provide himself with all incidental supplies required in the administration of his office. Where the sales of the same type of office are, for example, $8,001 per annum, the postmaster is supplied every facility without charge, and clerical allowance is increased from $2,100 per annum to approximately $3,900 per annum. In addition, the Government then furnishes all post-office boxes and other facilities. To be more specific, because of the sale of only $2 more stamps in 1 year over another the clerical allowance is increased approximately $150 per month, plus the furnishing of all facilities at a high annual rate. In addition, village letter carriers serving such offices may then be classified as city carriers, and receive approximately a 30-percent increase in salary.

Criticism in this respect does not apply to the Post Office Department but is directed at the Congress, and it is my opinion that postal laws and regulations should be rewritten in order to permit greater elasticity in the administration of the Post Office Department by the Postmaster General and less interference on the part of the Congress.

In this bill under discussion, I wish to congratulate the committee on its sympathetic attitude toward the rural carrier. The Republican as well as the Democratic Members have shown a helpful attitude toward our rural carriers, but I am very sorry that they have apparently failed to recognize the most pertinent features of the rural service which should be corrected. In this bill we have a striking example of exterior service which cries to high heaven for correction in the interest of justice to the rural carriers and also in the interest of the National Treasury.

According to my observation, some rural carriers are overpaid and others are underpaid. Strict justice would demand that this be corrected as soon as possible. I can explain this best by citing specific instances.

In my district, one rural carrier has a 30-mile route having 205 patrons. Another carrier in my district, with a 30-mile route has 705 patrons. Both carriers receive the same annual compensation, while the truth is that one of these men is working almost three and a half times more than the other. This is flagrantly unfair.

I have another rural carrier in my district who serves approximately 680 patrons. His route is 22 miles long. Notwithstanding that he has 475 more patrons than one of the carriers just mentioned, his compensation, under the provisions of the bill under discussion, will be approximately $300 less per annum than is the compensation of the carrier on the 30 mile route with only 205 boxes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. In just a moment.

This condition prevails throughout the United States where service is from the densely populated areas. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] just a moment ago made a reference to this same condition, which exists in his district.

In my opinion, we should enact legislation to correct the injustices in compensation paid to rural carriers with short routes but who have a large number of patrons on these short routes. While the amendment just adopted will reduce the compensation of this class of rural carriers only $180 per annum, it still places them in an unfortunate position with relation to other carriers with more mileage and fewer patrons to be served.

I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is correct in saying that something must be done about the short routes where there are many boxes and I want to inform the gentleman that we are endeavoring to work out a fair differential. The gentleman's amendment will not do justice and it will be necessary for us to fix a differential based on the number of boxes on the route. The Post Office Committee now has under consideration a separate measure to fix this differential and I hope the gentleman will not press the amendment, because it will not do justice.

Mr. HOEPPEL. The statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania brings out exactly what I referred to a moment ago when I spoke of the sympathetic attitude of the Post Office Committee. Both the Republican and the Democratic members are outstanding men and I know they will remedy this situation. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion and I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That no rural carrier shall operate more than one route."

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to prevent one rural carrier from operating more than one rural route. There are conditions in many parts of the country where one rural carrier handles two routes. He goes out in the morning on one route and comes back and starts out on another in the afternoon. In this time, when we are trying to make opportunities for employment for the unemployed, I think that condition is unfair.

Mr. DURGAN of Indiana. Will the gentleman turn to the committee and make that statement in a loud voice so it can hear. [Laughter.]

Mr. COLMER. I think the committee has heard it. I have mentioned it to them before. Now, I do not care to take up further time except to say that in fairness to millions of unemployed men I think the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. Are not the two routes that the gentleman mentions consolidated?

Mr. COLMER. It is my information that they are not.

Mr. DOWELL. I never heard of any two routes operated by one carrier, unless the routes were consolidated.

Mr. COLMER. I will ask the chairman of the committee if I am not correct.

Mr. MEAD. There are some cases where carriers operate two routes—usually one today and another tomorrow. If the mileage of the combined routes is 80 miles he is paid for a 40-mile daily route.

Mr. DOWELL. In that event the pay is fixed according to the schedule of one half of the combined mileage.

Mr. COLMER. I want to say that these cases have caused more discussion among the people, and reacted unfavorably to the rural mail carriers themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. The last sentence (making inapplicable to rural carriers provisions respecting rotative furloughs, and authorizing the President to suspend or reduce equipment allowances of rural carriers) of subsection (a) of section 9 of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934, and such sentence as continued and amended for the fiscal year 1935, are amended to read as follows: "The provisions of this section relating to furloughs shall not apply to carriers in the Rural Mail Delivery Service."

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all of section 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. Salaries (not including equipment-maintenance allowances) of rural carriers shall, during that portion of the fiscal year 1934 which remains after the time this act takes effect, and during the fiscal year 1935, be reduced by the percentage of reduction, if any, applicable by law to salaries of employees of the Government generally.

With the following committee amendment:

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. No rural route extended or established, by consolidation or otherwise, after this act takes effect, shall exceed 60 miles in length.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all of section 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 3, after line 18, insert:

"SEC. 3. No consolidation of rural routes shall be made otherwise than on account of the resignation, death, retirement, or dismissal on charges of carriers in the Rural Mail Delivery Service."

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment. Was that language suggested by the Postmaster General?

Mr. MEAD. No; it was not suggested, but the committee considered the amendment in section 4 that no rural route should be extended in excess of 60 miles. We thought that was too drastic, and so we continue the present law. That is, we permit consolidations as a result of retirement, resignation, death, or removal from the Service.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Under the Economy Act and the law as it is today, the President acting through the Postmaster General, by Executive order can order consolidations wherever he thinks it is feasible without waiting for death of one in the Service or his resignation or retirement if it be found that adequate delivery service can be given by consolidation of two short routes at a saving to the taxpayers; the Postmaster General can now consolidate. This language would not permit that to be done. Is not that true?

Mr. MEAD. Only as specified in the amendment.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Those occasions may not arise.

Mr. MEAD. They are arising.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Other than death, resignation, or retirement?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; dismissal, or discharge for cause.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The point I make is that occasion may arise when the Postmaster General may find it proper, at a saving to the Treasury, to consolidate two or more short routes, but he will not be permitted to do so if this language is carried in the bill.

Mr. MEAD. He is not doing it now, and no other Postmaster General has ever done so in the way the gentleman would permit. They are effecting consolidations when such occasions arise, and this bill will not prevent a deviation from present policy. Consolidations are being effected at the rate of from 75 to 100 a week, and routes are being extended until I doubt very much whether they can continue these consolidations for any great length of time. I believe we will have finished consolidations within the next few years. There is ample authority to create all the necessary consolidations in this amendment.

Mr. McDUFFIE. But it is based only upon death, resignation, or retirement. Those are the only conditions under which a consolidation may occur. Is not that correct?

Mr. MEAD. That is the existing policy.

Mr. McDUFFIE. It may be the existing policy, but suppose the Postmaster General found that certain routes should be consolidated, we will say two 20-mile routes; he may find such a thing is necessary and not hurtful to the Service. I am not an expert, but you prevent that under this committee amendment. I am trying to prevent the tying of the hands of the Postmaster General, so that he may not be able to act in the interest of the taxpayers of the country.

Mr. MEAD. In that case the Postmaster General would consolidate those two routes. He would effect that consolidation by a separation from the Service of a rural carrier on some other route, and so he can effect all the consolidations he wishes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman means that he will take a carrier from one of these routes and send him over to another route where there has been a retirement or a resignation or death.

Mr. MEAD. And that is just what he is doing now. That is the only way in which he can eliminate these short routes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Why hedge him about with this language?

Mr. MEAD. We are doing no more than the Postmaster General is doing himself.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I think if he had wanted this done he would have suggested it.

Mr. MEAD. We are the legislative committee and the Postmaster has not requested such authority.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, I represent a progressive farming district in Indiana. The farmers of that country have been served with prompt and efficient rural-mail service for 25 to 30 years. They have adapted their business and occupations to that service. They have come to expect and rely upon receiving their mail at an early hour in the day.

But under this proposed reorganization of the Service and consolidation of routes, many of these farmers are and will be thrown off the mail route from a quarter to a full mile.

Where the reorganization and consolidation has already gone into effect, many of the farmers have taken down their mail boxes rather than leave their mail exposed at some distant highway corner where delivered and are renting a box in the post office and going back for their mail, where they received their mail before the rural-route service was inaugurated.

I could understand this policy better, coming from the other side of the House, where greater attention has always been given to industry, and the interests of the people of the towns and cities have always been favored over the farm population.

But this side has always stood for the farm population and for the farmer against the impositions of high tariffs under which the farmers have been compelled to buy high and sell low.

This reversed position of the majority here puts the Members on this side at great disadvantage in their claim for equal rights and equal consideration of the farm population under the administration of public affairs. We can defy our enemies, but God only can save us from our fool friends. [Applause.]

I confess I am greatly confused and embarrassed by this uncalled-for policy of legislation, with the farmers still left to pay high prices for equipment and supplies, and before there is a proper rise of values and prices for their grain, crops, and stock. And now, with the administration withdrawing their only remaining consolation, the rural mail service, in the name of economy, I am constrained to exclaim in the words uttered by King Solomon when he was growing old and failing in his powers to meet the obligations of life, "All is vanity and vexation of spirit." [Laughter.]

The farmers today want to receive their mail at the noon hour and have their papers and letters before them at the midday meal the same as the town and city patrons want their mail and daily papers at the breakfast table. Where this consolidation has been carried out the farmers are greatly dissatisfied and discommoded with the service afforded. In many localities they are in a state of revolt and demanding a restoration of the service.

I am opposed to the policy of increasing salaries, cutting down the service, throwing men out of employment, lengthening the routes, and depriving the farmers of proper and convenient mail service only to effect trivial economy. This is not justifiable economy; it is false economy. It is not only an injury to the farmers but it is a policy in conflict with any principle of the recovery program.

The shorter routes not only afford the patrons earlier service and more regular, reliable, and prompt deliveries but I have made inquiries among the hundreds of men seeking rural-carrier positions and I find the majority would prefer a shorter route at half or less salary, which would leave them with the greater part of the day to devote to work for themselves or otherwise. This would afford both employment to a greater number and better and more prompt and reliable service to the patrons without greater cost to the Government.

The counties of my district include many highly developed and well-organized country communities. The town and the surrounding country form such communities, of which the town is the business and social center and the general meeting and assembling place of the people. In most, if not all, of these towns, well-regulated stores, a bank or banks, and other business institutions have been established. Modern high-school buildings, churches, theaters, or lecture halls have been erected, and physicians and other professional men have located there in response to the needs and wants of the people.

The town post office, long established, and the rural-route service have become a part of the community organization. Here the farmers come to market and ship their products, do their banking, and to purchase supplies to meet their daily needs. Here all the children of the nearby country come to attend school, and from greater distances come the more advanced students to graduate in the higher branches of education. Here the people come to attend their clubs, churches, lodge sessions, lecture courses, and various gatherings and entertainments.

Farmers or members of their families driving into town in the afternoon or evening on business or to attend club meetings or social entertainments and school children and high-school students from the country call at the post office to receive the afternoon or late mail; and farmers often drive in from the country to receive important mail matter arriving too late for delivery by the carrier, and which it is necessary for them to have in time for some important business transaction.

In these agricultural community centers telephone exchanges have been established, and telephone service has been extended over the country coextensive with the territory covered by the rural routes running out from their respective towns. Country patrons order many articles of merchandise to be delivered to them by parcel post, and town residents likewise take advantage to receive their food products from the country by the carriers on their return trips. Physicians respond to phone calls from their patients and send out their medicine by the rural carriers. The telephone and the carrier service have become joined as one coordinate system of local communication and transportation in general and universal use.

But this long route service deprives the people of all these advantages and conveniences, and places their mail beyond their reach in a far-distant town or city to which they never go and in which none of their interests are located, neither business nor social.

The free-delivery service of two or more daily deliveries of mail to the people of the towns and cities is not to be curtailed under this economy program. This service is in no way to be affected or impaired. The economy to be brought about and the service to be reduced is only to apply to the isolated rural population and to leave the farmer's mail long delayed and in some cases to arrive only late in the afternoon, and in bad weather even nearing the nighttime.

If the town and city free-delivery service was to be equally cut down and reduced to 1 delivery instead of 2 and if the same strenuous economy was to be observed in other departments of the public service, this proposition for economy at the expense of the rural population might come with better grace.

I am in favor of economy, but I am opposed to the impairment of the rural mail service as a means to effect economy and solely at the expense and at the sacrifice of the rural population. Reducing the cost at the expense of regular, reliable, and prompt service is not economy. It is a false system of cost reduction. Economy is maintaining efficient service while reducing expense and cost of operation or maintaining greater efficiency in the Service at the same cost. If mere cost reduction is economy, then greater economy would be effected by triweekly service, and still greater economy by a discontinuance of the Service altogether.

Reducing the number of carriers and increasing the salaries of those remaining, where a superior service can be secured by maintaining the full number of employees at the same cost to the Government, is not only a false economy but is a wrong policy of public employment at this time, when 10,000,000 remain unemployed.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAY. I yield.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. As a matter of fact, under the N.R.A. private employers are being urged to increase the number of their employees and to increase wages, are they not?

Mr. GRAY. I think that is the policy being urged under the N.R.A. program. I would rather see more men put on the routes than more men taken off, because that would increase employment and mean better and more prompt and efficient service to the farmers. But I would not want to increase the pay provided for in the Rural Route Service until there is a restoration of employment and an increase of pay to private employees. There is no reason why public employees, with a fixed and fair wage and with uninterrupted employment, should be favored over private employees.

Ten million men remain unemployed and strenuous efforts are being made to spread employment to a greater number of men. Economy is the watchword. The isolated farmers are suffering not only neglect but discrimination against them. Under these conditions it is difficult to understand this demand to increase the salaries of the few, consolidate the routes, and throw public employees out of employment, and at the same time compel the farm population to suffer an impairment of its mail service. This proposition is urged upon the country with a strange consistency at this time.

The so-called "economy" resulting would be trivial and negligible in comparison with the decrease of employment suffered and the great damage and injury brought upon the farm population.

But I am not advocating a change at this time in the Rural Route Service, except sufficient change to give better and give equal mail service to the farmers with the service provided for the patrons in towns and cities. But if I were making a change to meet the conditions of the times to effect economy and bring about an increase of employment to a greater number of men and afford more equal mail service, then it would be made under N.R.A. principles of employment. Then, I would say, until there is relief from this panic, divide the salaries, put two men on the routes instead of one and give the farmer his morning paper at breakfast time the same as enjoyed by the people of the towns and cities, put more men to useful service and take them off the relief roles. But I am not urging such change here. I am only opposing a change at this time that will reduce employment, work injury and damage to the farmer without a substantial saving. The farmers are satisfied with the existing service; they are asking the Postal Department to let well enough alone.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. This act shall take effect on April 15, 1934.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 3, line 23, strike out "April 15, 1934", and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the 1st day of the calendar month next following the month in which this act is enacted."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. WEST of Ohio, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the Committee having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 8919) to adjust the salaries of rural letter carriers, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 355, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MEAD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

[Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma, Mr. SABATH, Mr. MCDUFFIE and Mr. PATMAN asked and were given permission to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.]

PROPOSED TEXTBOOK CODE, IF ADOPTED, WILL ADD MILLIONS TO COST OF EDUCATION

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a resolution, same being House Resolution 351, asking for the appointment of a committee to investigate the proposed code for the school textbook industry. I feel that this is an important matter and fear that steps may be taken that will increase by many millions of dollars the annual outlay for books that our school patrons must buy. Every school child in America, whether in private, parochial, or public schools, is affected by the price of textbooks. Every teacher is affected. Every parent who buys textbooks is affected. I would not want to see any step taken that would add unnecessary burdens to our school children, teachers, and school patrons.

I have loyally supported the National Recovery Administration and was one of those who voted for the National Industrial Recovery Act. I have addressed civic clubs and organizations in practically every town in my district, calling upon business men to support the N.R.A. and urging the cooperation of citizens in eliminating the chiselers. The N.R.A. is not so important in the district represented by me in Congress as it is in the Eastern States, since my district is principally an agricultural section. In fact, the N.R.A. has worked a hardship on many small business men of Oklahoma, yet I have urged that the spirit and letter of the National Industrial Recovery Act be complied with to the fullest by citizens of my State.

But I also believe in State rights, and I do not believe we should take any action here, or permit action to be taken, that would impair or threaten to impair contracts entered into by our States for the protection of the schoolbook buying public. I feel that this matter should be gone into carefully before any definite action is taken.

Permit me to cite a few facts for consideration in connection with any proposal affecting textbooks.

By reason of the practices that have existed in the schoolbook industry, practically every State in the Union has laws for the protection of the consumer.

Textbook publishing companies are, practically without exception, organizations that employ teachers to write their textbooks, paying the authors small royalties on sales, and that employ commercial printing establishments to print their books.

Wage earners engaged in actual composition and printing of textbooks are all protected under codes for the various phases of the printing industry.

All employees of the textbook publishers are now protected as to hours and wages under the general provisions of the N.R.A.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the textbook publishers have sought to advance their own selfish interests at the expense of the consumers for more than a quarter of a century and I want to be assured that the proposed code is not another effort to advance the selfish interests of the textbook publishers and hide behind the protection of the Federal Government in so doing.

The proposed code appears to me to be merely an effort to take advantage of a national emergency to entrench the textbook publishers still further with the backing of Federal authority.

The State governments are coordinated with the Federal Government. They have never been in such financial difficulty as at present. Delinquent taxes, reduction in tax rates and tax strikes have threatened to close most of the public schools of this country. I feel that the schools are entitled to look to the Federal Government for financial aid in the present emergency and early in this session introduced legislation to provide for an annual Federal appropriation to aid our weak schools.

But so far the Federal Government, although giving temporary help to the public schools, has failed and refused to provide for a permanent program for schools that are financially unable to remain open a full term. In my judgment the very least the Government could do at this time would be to reduce rather than materially increase the cost of textbooks that are now in the making if the present textbook code is allowed to stand.

I see no reason why the Federal Government should interest itself in or lend sanction to a code which clearly has for its purpose the increasing of prices on this universally used product. If there must be a textbook code, I feel that it should be confined strictly to wages and hours and the necessary machinery to enforce such provisions without any effort, veiled or implied, to eliminate competitive bidding. The school patrons certainly should not be called upon in their distressed financial condition to add to the profits of the textbook trust. Nor should it be made easy for the publishers to evade, under the protection of the Federal Government, the laws of the various States.

WAGES IN FEDERAL BUILDINGS

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to extend my remarks by including therein a newspaper article and certain letters.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to your attention a set of circumstances which carry alarming possibilities. First let me place before you an article which appeared in the Washington Herald of this morning:

WAGES RACKET MENACES UNITED STATES BUILDING HERE—CARPENTERS' UNION VOTES 5 TO 1 FOR RESTORATION OF $11 RATE—CONTRACTORS' OFFER SPURNED

The entire Federal building program in this city, involving $100,000,000 in massive Government buildings, faces a sudden halt unless contractors are made to return the $500,000 wage steal, the local carpenters gave notice last night.

Charging that the present rate of $8 a day paid to union men was illegally adopted and has robbed workmen of half a million dollars, the membership of the union demanded, by an overwhelming vote of 5 to 1, that the $11 rate (on the 8-hour day) be restored.

The contractors offered a compromise of $8.80 a day but this met with a crushing defeat, 828 to 156.

CONTRACT NEAR END

Only 4 more days remain until the present contract expires. Unless an agreement can be reached by May 1, union officials declared they will be forced to call a strike.

More than 1,000 members of the local carpenters' union fought for admission into Carpenters Hall, 1010 Tenth Street, last night, to attend the special meeting called to decide on the terms of the wage contract which will be drawn between the union and the Master Builders' Association, representing the employers.

Two propositions were presented to the meeting. One came from the Master Builders' Association. It offered an 8-hour day, 5-day week with a rate of $1.10 an hour.

The other, which the union adopted, calls for a 6-hour day, 5-day week, with a rate of $1.37½ an hour. This is the rate at which the Government contracts were let and at which the carpenters were originally hired.

HERALD WORK LAUDED

Subsequently the rate was reduced. The union claimed this act was illegal because it was never accepted by a vote of the membership. It is charged that workmen have been robbed of $500,000 during the last year through the illegal reduction in wages.

Last night Albert Caya, business agent for the union, and J. B. Lagasa, who has been working with Caya to bring about a restoration of the wage scale, spoke in favor of the $11 rate. Lagasa said:

"We are making splendid progress toward having our rightful wage rate restored. The $1.37½ rate is not a raise. It is the rate that was in force on all Government work prior to last year, when the present illegal contract went into effect.

"It has been ruled to be the prevailing wage on two occasions by the United States Treasury Department. Congress is now interested in finding out how we have been deprived of the money which the Government paid to the contractors for us. The Washington Herald has done a wonderful job in bringing the facts to light. I hope you will vote for the $1.37½-an-hour rate, as I am going to."

"TO HELL" WITH THEM

The hall resounded with cheers for several minutes after Caya and Lagasa sat down. Immediately after the membership voted the $1.37½ rate by a landslide.

The 6-hour day stipulation will fix the daily rate at $8.25. This is less than the daily rate of $8.80 now offered by the contractors. It would mean that several hundred more carpenters would have to be employed to keep up production schedule.

Frank J. Sheehan, secretary of the Master Builders' Association, when informed that the union had rejected the contractors' offer, replied:

"If they want to reject it, to hell with them."

Let me place particular emphasis upon the last paragraph of that article. After reporting that the union carpenters of the District of Columbia had voted to reject a wage compromise with the Master Builders' Association, the article says in this last paragraph:

Frank J. Sheehan, secretary of the Master Builders' Association, when informed that the union had rejected the contractors' offer, replied:

"If they want to reject it, to hell with them."

The money to pay the wages under discussion, Mr. Speaker, is not the money of Mr. Sheehan nor of the Master Builders' Association. It is the public money of the American people, appropriated by the Congress, and allotted by the Executive for the primary purpose, not of fattening contractors but of giving payment to skilled craftsmen for the work they do with their hands and brains. That makes the affair the business of this House.

I read that statement of Mr. Sheehan's with astonishment. I made inquiries to discover who this Mr. Sheehan is, who so casually says that workmen employed on work paid for by the United States Government can take what he and his associates choose to give them or else—and I am quoting Mr. Sheehan—"To 'hell' with them."

I found out a little about Mr. Sheehan. My time was short and so the findings are not yet extensive. Perhaps they will grow with time. But, short as they are, they are of considerable interest.

First. I call your attention to an extract from a letter written by G. Clark Macomber, of the George B. H. Macomber Co., of Boston, Mass., and addressed to Mr. R. D. Morrison, post-office box no. 283, Benjamin Franklin Post Office, Washington, D.C. This extract reads as follows:

I further understand that you have agreed that we would contribute to the Washington Building Trades Employers' Association the sum of $500 to be paid in installments, an initial installment of $100 which you can pay from petty cash during the coming week, and the balance to be paid during the life of the B-W job as may work out most conveniently for us. Please make certain that the dollar-an-hour rate for carpenters is in effect before making any contribution to the employers' association.

Let me say that the prevailing rate of wages in Washington to be paid to carpenters under the Bacon-Davis Act was and is $1.37½ per hour.

Now I quote another letter in which a demand is made for the payment of this contribution to what may turn out to have been a slush fund.

GEORGE A. FULLER CO.,
Washington, D.C., May 2, 1933.

GEORGE B. H. MACOMBER CO.,
Care of McCloskey Co., Washington, D.C.

GENTLEMEN: Will you kindly forward to the writer your check made out to the Master Builders' Association, in amount agreed upon as promptly as possible.

The writer has received several calls from the secretary of the association regarding this matter and it is getting to be rather embarrassing inasmuch as the master builders fulfilled their part of the agreement 2 weeks ago.

Trusting you will give this your immediate attention, I am,
Very truly yours,

J. B. BOWLING, Jr.

The secretary of the association wanted his money. Who was this secretary? The next letter will tell us.

WASHINGTON, D.C., July 20, 1933.

Re: B-W Construction Co.,
Washington post-office extension.

Mr. C. CLARK MACOMBER,
George B. H. Macomber Co., Boston, Mass.

DEAR CLARK: Joe Bowling, of Littlejohn, Bowling & Morris, and Frank Sheehan, secretary of the Master Builders Association, were on the job today asking me for the balance due for our contribution toward the reduction in carpenters' rate. They seem to think they have waited long enough for us to realize a saving and want to get the matter cleaned up.

You will remember some time ago I made them a payment of $100 from the petty cash account and they are now looking for the balance. I told them I would write to you regarding the situation and I think you might reply directly to Frank J. Sheehan, secretary, Master Builders Association, 1719 I Street NW., Washington, D.C.

Sincerely,

RALPH D. MORRISON.

Now let me add another interesting letter about Mr. Sheehan. Everything seems to be getting along all right. The contractors are making money, even if the carpenters are not. Mr. Sheehan is to have some of his money, but only a part of it. The rest will have to wait until Mr. Macomber could get it out of Uncle Sam.

GEORGE B. H. MACOMBER CO., BUILDERS,
CHARLES CHAUNCY BUILDING,
Boston, Mass., July 21, 1933.

Re: B-W Construction Co.,
Washington post-office extension.

Mr. R. D. MORRISON,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MORRISON: I have your note relative to Mr. Sheehan and Joe Bowling, relative to the Building Trades Association. Mr. Sheehan called me on the telephone after he left you. I told him that I would at this time send him a small remittance that would follow with the balance as soon as we could get it out of the B-W job.

I have not had any comments from any of you three men on the job relative to the communications which I sent to you on Tuesday. I am assuming, therefore, that everything is coordinating properly and that you are working together to accomplish the objectives as we set them forth on Monday and as I confirmed them to you in my Tuesday communications.

Yours very truly,

C. C. MACOMBER.

That is as much as I can tell you today about Mr. Sheehan, who says "to hell with them" in speaking of workmen.

RURAL LETTER CARRIERS—EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all those who spoke on the rural letter carriers' bill may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the permission granted by the House yesterday during the discussion of the bill to adjust the salaries of rural letter carriers, I desire to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD information pertaining to these carriers which may be of interest to the Members of the House.

RURAL ROUTES

There is no limitation upon length of routes.

The shortest route at present is 7.6 miles, at West Englewood, N.J.

Longest routes are at Brawley, Calif., and Brewster, Ala., each 91 miles.

All persons, except those who reside within the city-delivery limits of cities where city-delivery service is in operation, or within the village-delivery limits of cities, towns, or villages where village-delivery service is in operation, may be served by rural carriers, provided they will erect approved boxes on the established line of the routes in the manner required by the Department.

Roads on which rural-delivery service is established shall be in good condition and so maintained, unobstructed by gates, and there shall be no unbridged streams not fordable at all seasons of the year.

The frequency of service on a newly established route shall not exceed three times a week, unless such route is formed wholly or in greater part by rearrangement of six-times-a-week service.

Rural mail delivery shall be extended so as to serve, as nearly as practicable, the entire rural population of the United States.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, April 26, 1934.

Hon. JAMES M. MEAD,
Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MEAD: Further reference is made to your letter of April 18, enclosing a copy of bill H.R. 8919 to adjust the salaries of rural letter carriers, and requesting certain information pertaining to the rural service for consideration in connection with the measure.

If legislation were enacted limiting the lengths of rural routes hereafter to 60 miles, it would frequently be impracticable for the Department to effect consolidations of rural routes, but no estimate can be made as to the extent to which reduction of the cost of operating the service would thereby be prevented.

If the equipment-maintenance allowance to rural carriers were fixed at 5 cents per mile per day instead of 6 cents, as proposed in bill H.R. 8919, the difference in cost would be approximately $4,150,000 per annum.

A statement is enclosed showing the amounts of salaries as well as the amounts of salaries with equipment-maintenance allowances, for service over rural routes of different lengths, which are authorized by existing law and those which would be authorized by proposed legislation now under consideration in Congress.

There are approximately 500 rural routes from 7 to 19 miles in length. Only 86 of these are less than 15 miles in length. These rural routes are operated where the territory is limited in which the condition of roads and the number of families that would be served would warrant extending the routes to greater lengths. It will no doubt be practicable to absorb some of these short routes through consolidations of service, but many of them will have to be continued because there are no adjacent routes with which they can be combined. No definite information can be given as to how many of them can be eliminated through consolidations.

The chart enclosed by you is returned as requested.

Sincerely yours,

HARLLEE BRANCH,
Second Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, there is no type of Government employee upon whose faithful, efficient service the comfort and convenience of the public more depends, than the rural carrier. He is like a soldier and must see that the mail goes through irrespective of sunshine or storm.

This bill, H.R. 8919, adjusts the salaries of rural letter carriers and makes provision for their equipment-maintenance allowance. No group was more savagely hit by the Economy Act than the rural letter carriers. They were caught going and coming. They were at the mercy of the departmental head who was intent upon making a record and were made the subject of repeated changes in their salary and allowances. This bill fixes their status. The salary of a carrier in the Rural Free Delivery Service, serving a rural route of 30 miles, 6 days a week, will be $1,800. It should be kept in mind that this is actually a reduction in base pay.

If there is additional mileage he shall receive $20 per mile per annum or major fraction thereof. This measure fixes the mileage allowance for equipment and maintenance at 6 cents per mile. The statute insures permanence of this provision, for such allowance cannot be changed except by act of Congress. It provides that no consolidation of rural routes shall be made otherwise than on account of the resignation, death, retirement, or dismissal on charges of carriers in the rural mail service. This last provision removes the ever-present fear of retirement from the service.

It gives them an added mileage allowance which in my judgment is actually inadequate.

CLIMATE A FACTOR

The status of the rural letter carrier has been clouded by the fact that many of those administering the laws have never felt the rigorous and extreme weather that is typical of our climate in the northern States, both east and west. In my section of New York there are 5 months of solid winter, with the thermometer below zero much of the time. Snow, accompanied by windstorms of gale force, are frequent and these storms often continue over a period of days. On many of the roads the ordinary motor method of transportation has to be abandoned and horses have to be supplied by the carrier under his arrangement with the Government. These horses have to be maintained by the carrier during the open season or he has to rent in the emergency. Roads are blocked with a coating of snow many feet deep. Drifts attain the height of 15 to 20 feet. All the perils and none of the glory of arctic exploration are present in the performance of duty by the rural carriers. I have no hesitancy in saying that the allowance of 6 cents per mile in the northern latitudes is not sufficient. I would gladly vote to make it 8 cents per mile.

But I am for this bill because it does partial justice to a group of faithful public servants. It does partial justice to a group of veteran employees who, during the rigors and perils of the northern winter, face the storms unflinchingly and bring the newspapers, supplies, and comforts of civilization to those who dwell in the open spaces.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Goss indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN SENATE,
Albany, April 12, 1934.

By Mr. Burchill

Whereas the Missionary Society of St. Paul the Apostle, a domestic corporation of the State of New York, owns and operates, in the city of New York, Radio Station WLWL; and

Whereas such radio station is maintained for rendering religious, educational, cultural, and social service; and

Whereas in July 1925 the Department of Commerce granted to the said Missionary Society of St. Paul the Apostle a class b commercial license, no. 1829, to broadcast with 5,000-watt power and with unlimited time; and

Whereas on the 13th day of October 1926, due to a request from the Department of Commerce, the Radio Station WLWL changed its frequency from 1,040 to 780 under license no. 1829 with the enjoyment of unlimited time; and

Whereas said license no. 1829 was renewed without change on January 22, 1927; and

Whereas the Federal Radio Commission was created in February 1927 and said commission requested all stations to designate the minimum number of hours necessary to their existence; and

Whereas Radio Station WLWL specified the evening hours of 7:30 to 9:30 on Sunday and 8 p.m. to 11 p.m. on week days, Monday to Saturday inclusive, with 1 hour Thursday mornings; and

Whereas the Federal Radio Commission notified Radio Station WLWL that it would have to broadcast on a 1020 frequency instead of 780 frequency and Radio Station WLWL appealed from said ruling, and on June 8, 1927, was assigned to an 810 frequency; and

Whereas on June 10, 1927 the Federal Radio Commission caused Radio Station WLWL to share the frequency 810 with a commercial Station WMCA; and

Whereas the hours on the air to be enjoyed by Radio Station WLWL were to be fixed by the commercial Station WMCA; and

Whereas in September 1928 the Federal Radio Commission assigned Radio Station WLWL to 1,100 frequency, together with the commercial Station WPG of Atlantic City; and

Whereas Station WLWL was assigned 15½ broadcasting-hours per week and WPG was assigned 110½ broadcasting-hours per week; and

Whereas the license of WPG was renewed despite the fact that, in violation of the rulings of the Commission, it had leased not only all its broadcasting hours, but had surrendered control over the programs and operations of its station to the Columbia Broadcasting System; and

Whereas there are 30 radio stations in the United States classified as educational, enjoying a total of 817 hours and 40 minutes of broadcasting time each week, or an average of 4 hours per day for each station; and

Whereas the broadcasting time assigned to educational radio stations amounts to but 2½ percent of all broadcasting time; and

Whereas it is the proud boast of the United States that its people are devoted to the cause of education and to freedom in the exercise of religious beliefs: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby memorialized, to enact with all convenient speed, such measures as may be necessary to increase the broadcasting time of educational and religious associations to one quarter of all the radio-broadcasting facilities; and be it further

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That Radio Station WLWL, owned and operated by the Missionary Society of St. Paul the Apostle, in the city of New York, State of New York, be granted a reasonable extension of its broadcasting time; and be it further Resolved (if the assembly concur), That a copy of this resolution be submitted to the Secretary of the United States Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives elected from the State of New York, and that the latter be urged to use their best offices to procure the enactment of such legislation as will accomplish the purpose of this resolution.

Whereas this report has been received with virtually unanimous praise from conservationists from every part of the State of New York and elsewhere throughout the United States; and

Whereas the conservation commissioner of the State of New York, after close examination of the report, has endorsed it enthusiastically: Therefore be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the people of the State of New York, through their representatives in the senate and assembly, request the President and Congress of the United States to adopt the report of the President's Committee on Wild Life Restoration as a basis for legislation and executive action designed to increase and protect the wild life of the Nation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE presented resolutions adopted by the Council of the City of Kenosha, Wis., which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution 1812 (by Mr. Burns)

Whereas the discontinuance of the Civil Works Administration program has resulted in the unemployment of a large number of men and women in the city of Kenosha; and

Whereas a plan has been worked out by Federal and State authorities whereby certain work may be made available to those persons receiving relief or who are eligible to relief; and

Whereas the amount of money appropriated to Kenosha County for relief and work relief is inadequate to provide properly work for the able-bodied men and women now eligible under the Federal emergency relief plan; and

Whereas Kenosha County has agreed to provide the sum of $35,000 monthly for direct relief and work relief for the unemployed within the county of Kenosha and has agreed to continue to pay said sum as long as money is available for said purpose; and

Whereas the resources of Kenosha County are strained because of the business depression and the inability of the property owners and citizens within said county and city to pay their taxes, and the credit of Kenosha County has been deeply pledged for funds made available as aforesaid; and

Whereas application has been made to the Industrial Commission of the State of Wisconsin for payment of the work-relief and direct-relief program out of Federal funds to the extent of 100 percent thereof in order to relieve Kenosha County of such serious financial strain; and

Whereas the program heretofore adopted will allow the employment of only a small percentage of the needy and unemployed workers within Kenosha County, thereby working a hardship upon those for whom employment is impossible to obtain under present conditions; and

Whereas the county of Kenosha is unable to raise funds in any manner under existing laws to adequately provide employment for the remainder of the unemployed workers of Kenosha County; and

Whereas a resolution has been presented to the City Council of Kenosha from the Kenosha County Workers Committee, urging State and Federal governmental agencies to provide larger funds for the work-relief program which has been designed to follow the Civil Works Administration program: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Council of the City of Kenosha does hereby petition His Excellency the Honorable A. G. Schmedeman, Governor of Wisconsin, to call into special session the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin for the purpose of enacting legislation establishing a more adequate and comprehensive work-relief program for the unemployed workers of Kenosha County, and for the State at large, and for the further purpose of enacting such legislation to finance such program as to the legislature shall seem wise and just; and be it further

Resolved, That said legislature petition the President and the Congress of the United States for such financial need and assistance to the State of Wisconsin necessary for the carrying on of such plan whereby employment may be obtained for as large a number of unemployed workers throughout the State of Wisconsin as is expedient and possible; and be it further

Resolved, That the city clerk be and he is hereby instructed to forward a copy of this resolution, together with the resolution of the Kenosha County Workers Committee to His Excellency the Governor, the local State senator, and assemblymen, and to the local Congressman, as well as the United States Senators from Wisconsin.

Passed this 16th day of April, A.D. 1934.

JAKE J. HERRMANN,
President Pro Tempore of the Council.

Attest:

A. E. AXTELL,
Clerk of the Council.

I, A. E. Axtell, city clerk, hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of resolution adopted by the city of Kenosha on the 16th day of April, A.D. 1934.

A. E. AXTELL, City Clerk.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE also presented a resolution addressed to the city manager and members of the Council of the City of Kenosha, Wis., which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution

To the City Manager and Members of the Council of the City of Kenosha:

Whereas the Federal Government has canceled the Civil Works program, thereby throwing 4,000,000 men and women out of employment; and

Whereas 6,000 of Kenosha's workers are now unemployed and the great majority thereof are now living on relief and there is no hope in sight, either by action of Congress, the President, or our Governor of Wisconsin; and

Whereas there are at least 10,000,000 men and women workers now without employment in addition to the 4,000,000 recently discharged from the C.W.A. and the $600,000,000 available for relief will employ less than 1 in 10 for only 8 months and is therefore insufficient to prevent misery and starvation; and

Whereas local, county, and State governments must finance any project under the plan of 70-30-percent basis and thereby raise sufficient funds to give work to all instead of only 400 or less than 1 in 10 of Kenosha's unemployed, which will create jealousy, hatred, and the building of a small political machine; and

Whereas it would be more just and equitable that enough money be raised to put all to work and that a special session of the legislature ought therefore be called to levy a sufficient income tax and an increased inheritance tax to cover this absolute necessity, rather than employ an insignificant number of men and thereby cause more discontent and dissension, as, under the present ruling, there is not enough to even begin to relieve the situation; and

Whereas the superestate or inheritance tax levied and income taxes are the most just taxes that can be levied because such a levy puts the burden on those who have been most favorably taken care of and given such favorable financial opportunities by laws permitting them to accumulate wealth; and

Whereas the general welfare of the people of the State and Nation demands that the great body of our citizens shall first be provided for rather than the small minority and heretofore most favored few: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Kenosha County Workers Committee does hereby petition the city manager and the City Council of Kenosha to use their best offices for an immediate call into special session of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin for the purpose of enacting such legislation in behalf of the general welfare so as to establish a more adequate and comprehensive work-relief program for the great and increasing body of unemployed workers of Kenosha County and for the State at large.

THE TARIFF—ADDRESS BY SENATOR REED

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an address by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], delivered during the National Radio Forum arranged by the Washington Star and broadcast over the National Broadcasting Co. network on Monday night, April 23. The subject of the address was the request of the President to Congress for the passage of a law to give him the power to raise or lower any tariff duty.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I should like to talk to you tonight, in language as simple as I can make it, about the President's request of Congress for the passage of a law giving him the power to raise or lower any tariff duty as much as 50 percent whenever he thinks it wise to do so in the interest of our foreign trade.

This proposal seems to be a clear contradiction of the statements made previously by President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Cordell Hull. The plan would make the Tariff Commission ineffective if not wholly impotent. It would permit the President to raise or lower tariff duties, not only without regard to the Commission's recommendations but without regard to the effect of this action on American industry. This power used unwisely—and it is certainly unwise to ask for a power to be used without knowing the facts—would make it possible to sink long-established American industries without a trace. It could easily wipe out whole communities, adding them to the ghost towns which once knew life and happiness but now live only in memory.

We find President Roosevelt saying on July 20, 1932, in a radio address delivered from Albany, N.Y., while a candidate for President: "It is a difficult and highly technical matter to determine standards and costs of production abroad and at home. A commission of experts can be trusted to find such facts, but not to dictate policies. The facts should be left to speak for themselves, free from Presidential interference."

Yet now the President proposes to ignore the Tariff Commission and asks for power to reduce duties, without notice to those affected, without a hearing, and without any chance to protest.

Again we find that he said on October 19, 1932, at Wheeling, W.Va.: "I have advocated a lowering of tariffs by negotiation with foreign countries. But I have not advocated, and I never will advocate, a tariff policy that will withdraw protection from American workers against those countries which employ cheap labor or who operate under a standard of living which is lower than that of our own great laboring groups."

Where in the world, may I ask, is there any country which does not employ cheaper labor than the United States and whose standard of living is not lower than those of our own great laboring groups? I have been in many countries of the world, and I have studied wage comparisons, production costs, and price comparisons in these countries, and I know of none whose living standards even approaching those of the United States.

And we find Secretary Hull saying in 1929, while a Member of the House of Representatives, with reference to a proposal for greater flexibility in tariff rates: "The proposed enlargement and broad expansion of the provisions and functions of the flexible tariff is astonishing, is undoubtedly unconstitutional, and is violative of the functions of the American Congress. Not since the Commons wrenched from an English King the power and authority to control taxation has there been a transfer of the taxing power back to the Head of a Government on a basis so broad and unlimited as is proposed in the pending bill. As has been said on a former occasion, 'This is too much power for a bad man to have or for a good man to want.'"

I am willing to agree entirely with that statement.

In the light of the latest proposal for dealing with the tariff, I can only conclude that it makes a difference at which end of Pennsylvania Avenue Secretary Hull does his thinking on this subject.

Let us understand that there is nothing mysterious about the tariff. A great deal is said and thought about it which is untrue; and when there is a tariff revision, we hear complicated discussions of wages and rates of duty and imports and exports and of all the other factors which must be taken into consideration, or which should be taken into consideration, when any change is made in any tariff duty. But it is not necessary to go into the subject on this basis tonight. We shall have a clearer understanding of the problem, I think, if we start with a simple statement of what the tariff is and why we are a protectionist country.

As an aid to that understanding, let us remember that a tariff or customs duty is nothing but a tax on foreign goods. The free-trader will tell you that this tax, which has a tendency to restrict the flow of these foreign goods into the United States, is imposed in the interest of rich manufacturers in this country, who, enjoying this protection against foreign competition, line their pockets with the excess profits they are thereby enabled to take from the American consumers. The manufacturers themselves will tell you that without this protection their industries could not exist. The truth lies somewhere between these two statements. The facts are that few industries at present are making much money, owing to the intensity of domestic competition; that some industries would go out of business if they were not protected against foreign competition; that a very large group of small industries would be killed or seriously crippled if the protection they now enjoy were withdrawn; and that a third group do not need any tariff protection on their products for the simple reason that Americans prefer their American-made products to the foreign-made goods offered by their foreign competitors.

The automobile industry is a fair example of one which turns out so superior a product at so low a cost—due, of course, to the enormous number of cars used in the United States as compared with other countries—that it needs little, if any, protection. But this industry is an exception to the rule. The great body of American workers and of American industries could not last a year, under modern competitive conditions, without some measure of protection against foreign competition.

Now, just why is this true? The answer is perfectly plain to anyone who has seen or read or stopped to think about the conditions under which men, women, and children work in other countries. Remember that in most foreign countries there are no minimum-wage laws, no 5-day week, no 6- or 7- or 8-hour day. Remember that in Italy, where the people were working 14 hours a day at a pitifully low wage, Premier Mussolini has just lowered wages again and speeded up Italy's industrial production for the purpose, as he explained, of "placing Italy in a better position to compete with other countries in the world's markets." Remember that in Germany the women formerly employed in industry have been ordered back to their homes and the men put under semimilitary discipline requiring them to work long hours at low wages. Even in England, where wages and working conditions are very much better than on the Continent of Europe, people do not begin to live as well as they do in the United States. It is worth noting here also that much of England's present prosperity—and she is much farther along the road to recovery than we are—is due to the abandonment of her free-trade policy in favor of protection, plus the empire-preference agreement by which her goods are accorded preferential treatment in the British dominions.

And when we stop to think of conditions in Japan and China, and examine the soaring figures of Japanese importations into the United States—of socks and table scarfs and children's clothing and kitchenware selling in the 5- and 10-cent stores—we must realize that every article of this sort which comes into the United States displaces a similar article which otherwise would have been made by American workmen, and displaces just so much American labor; and that the reason it comes in is not that American industry is inefficient, but because we have not adequately protected it against this sort of competition, and that without our very much higher wage rates American industries cannot exist without protection against this oriental competition.

Again there is no mystery about this. It is idle to contend that the British, the Germans, and the Japanese are more efficient than we are. The reason they can flood this country with their goods—as they do, in some instances, and as they could, in others, if we did not act in self-defense to prevent it—is that their wages are so far below ours that we in this country cannot comprehend the conditions under which their workmen live. In a land like the United States, where automobiles are so common, it is impossible to conceive of a country where no workingman owns a bathtub or enjoys the benefits of electricity and gas and running water. Yet this is the kind of competition we must meet unless we are willing to continue the protection we have given to American workers since the beginning of the Republic.

The first tariff act in this country was passed by Congress in 1789. Never at any time since have the ports of the United States been open to the unrestricted flow of foreign goods. Behind the tariff walls whose foundations were laid at that time we have flourished and grown great as a nation. Protection and sound money have been the twin pillars of our governmental policy in all that time. Now, having for the first time in our history debased the dollar deliberately in the hope of selling more goods abroad, we find the present Washington administration asking Congress for a power that no administration has ever had in dealing with the problem of import duties.

I shall not discuss tonight the constitutionality of this proposal. Some of us think that Congress cannot properly delegate this power to the President. On this question there will naturally be disagreement. It is possible that the courts would uphold such a grant of power. But important as this issue is, we need not concern ourselves with it here. Rather, let us think only of the wisdom of such a policy. Is it wise to give the President—any President—the power of life and death over American industry; to give into his sole keeping the power to say that this or that industry doesn't belong in the United States and should therefore be scrapped; to put a padlock on the doors of a great factory and turn its employees into the street because some bureau official who advises the President on these subjects thinks it would be better for Americans to buy glass and chinaware and shoes made in Czechoslovakia; or metal wares made in England or Germany; or hats made in Italy; or pencils and textiles made in Japan? Or, if the power to reduce duties were to be exercised in the case of agricultural products, we might find some official deciding for us in the name of the President that all our dairy products ought to come from Canada; our wheat, from Canada and Russia; our wool, from Australia; our cattle, from Argentina; and our cotton, from Egypt; so that those countries in theory could buy more automobiles from America. That might make the people of Detroit happy if the theory worked, but I doubt very much whether it would add to the total happiness of the American people.

And that, in short, is exactly what the President is proposing. He is asking this power for trading purposes, so that, in his unrestrained discretion, he can let in a larger volume of foreign goods, so that, at least in theory, we could sell a larger volume of American goods in some foreign market.

When we stop to consider that except for automobiles and machinery and a limited group of other manufactures in which we specialize, and which we turn out in quantities which cannot be duplicated elsewhere in the world because of the wealth and extent of our domestic market, other nations can make most of the things we do, and make them very much cheaper, it is impossible to conceive that we would get anything but the worst of the bargain in any such reciprocal tariff policy. We have so much that they want, and they so little that we want. I strongly suspect that the shrewd people who dominate the foreign policy of the other trading countries are laughing up their sleeves at this moment in anticipation of what they will do to us if Congress should give the President what he wants. I am not sure that it will, and I hope earnestly that it won't.

But, you say, the President has the power now to raise or to lower tariff duties within the same range of 50 percent. True, he has; but only after a thorough inquiry by the Tariff Commission into the cost of the domestic product and the competing foreign product; and only after the Tariff Commission, having ascertained the facts, recommends to the President that the existing tariff duty be raised or lowered in order to equalize the prices of the foreign and the domestic product in the principal markets of this country.

If it costs a dollar to make a given article in Germany, and a dollar and a half to make the same article here, the tariff in that event would be 50 percent, or 50 cents, on the German product, so that the American manufacturer and the German could compete on equal terms in New York or Boston or Philadelphia or Detroit, or whatever happened to be the principal domestic market for this particular product. That is the way the tariff and the flexible provision of the tariff act work out at present. The Tariff Commission reports the facts to the President and the President acts on the facts. But what is being asked now is a power which would permit the President to change tariff duties—and that means change them downward—without regard to the facts. What the President asks is permission to ignore the facts; to shut his eyes to the facts; to raise or lower tariff duties without even asking for the facts. That is the evil in this proposal. That is the reason that some of us, not as political partisans but as experienced legislators and business men, with some knowledge of conditions in American industry as well as in foreign countries, have thought it necessary to oppose the President's proposal as strongly as we know how.

There is in the bill no provision whatever for any representation or hearing of those most vitally interested before the President negotiates his proposed treaties and sweeps away in doing so the trade position of some American industry. Not until the treaty was actually signed would any industry know of the President's purpose to shut it down in favor of some foreign competitor. American farmers or American workmen would wake up some morning and read that the President had agreed to sweeping reductions in the duties on wheat, or cotton or cotton textiles, or lace, or on shoes, or pig iron, or pottery, or machine tools, or rayon, or leather, or rubber goods.

It has been stated in the debate on the measure that the power the President asks would not be used to the disadvantage of any large or essential industry. It can only be concluded that this means the smaller industries are to be sacrificed—industries which in some States represent one third of the total of all industries and give employment to more than a third of the workers. On the judgment of one man these small industries could be traded out of existence overnight without being given a chance to protest and without a word of warning or explanation.

One of the primary purposes of the new deal has been to restore employment. The latest report from the Department of Labor indicates that employment in manufacturing industries is still 30 percent below the average employment in 1926, toward which efforts are being made to raise it. Much of the increase which has been reported in recent months has been due to the spread of the work among a larger number of persons and to the cooperation of industry in shortening hours and raising wages. It is now proposed to give the President a power which, if exercised at all in the manner for which it is asked, would subject these same industries and their workers to the possibility of disaster and unemployment—in short, undo all the good that has been done by the machinery of recovery already set in motion. It would place in unseen hands, almost at the mercy of foreign bankers and business men and diplomatic bargainers, the power to control the jobs of millions of American workers. If the power to reduce duties were exercised, wages would be reduced, factories would close, and the no-more-work ticket might appear in any one of millions of pay envelopes. And all as the result of the guesswork of some men or some group with only an academic knowledge of business problems and economic laws.

In my State alone—in Pennsylvania—the normal employment of workers in manufacturing industries is more than a million. This means that 5,000,000 persons, or half the population of the State, are directly dependent on manufacturing for their daily bread. These industries have been built up over a period of many years. Most of them enjoy some degree of tariff protection. The lace industry, for example, which employs several thousand persons, has been in existence for more than 50 years, yet is singled out by Secretary of Agriculture Wallace as one of those which should be shut down so that we could buy our lace from Europe. How will Secretary Wallace explain it to the workers in that industry, if it should be shut down as a result of this proposed policy? I wonder if he has given any thought to the suffering that would follow the removal of this or other tariff duties which alone make it possible for these American industries to keep going?

Not always have those who are in charge of the Government at present felt as they say they do now. In 1928 a select committee of the Senate investigated the manner in which the flexible provisions of the tariff act were being administered. You will remember that it was not long after this that Secretary Hull seemed to be horrified at the idea of placing the power to change tariff duties in the President's hands. Two years before he spoke, the Democratic leader of the Senate, Senator JOSEPH T. ROBINSON of Arkansas, a fine, able, and sincere statesman, said in a report submitted to the Senate:

"It is impracticable for the President to devote the time and attention essential to the proper performance of the duties imposed upon him by the flexible tariff law. The Chief Executive is already overburdened with executive duties.

"Tariff making and revision under our Constitution are legislative duties, and to impose such responsibilities on the President as are carried in the flexible provision confuses legislative and executive responsibility."

I hope that he will join me now in opposing this even more sweeping provision giving additional power to the President at a time when he is more heavily burdened with executive duties than any other Chief Executive since the World War.

One word in conclusion: What we need in this country is confidence in the future. We cannot have confidence in the future without confidence in the Government. We cannot have confidence in either with so many uncertainties overhanging the business world. This proposal would add to those uncertainties. It might easily upset the whole recovery program. How could we keep wages up? How could we pay the N.R.A. minimum? Japan has no N.R.A., nor has Russia, nor Germany, nor England, nor Italy. How can our industries live in competition with the child labor and peasant labor of Europe? With the coolie labor of China? How can we in America maintain our living standards if compelled to compete on even terms with countries which have never known such standards? Until I hear a satisfactory answer to these questions—and I do not believe there is one—I will continue to regard this proposal as a menace to the security and happiness of every American home.

NATIONAL DEFENSE—ADDRESS BY SENATOR ROBINSON OF INDIANA

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, on Saturday, April 14, 1934, the learned senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] delivered a very interesting speech on "National Defense" over a Columbia coast-to-coast network, from Washington, D.C. I ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

If the American Republic shall continue to survive, it is of the utmost importance that it be prepared at all times to defend itself. We are a peace-loving people and do not seek trouble with any land. Indeed, we will do anything within our power to remain in peaceful relations with the rest of the world. We do not seek a foot of ground belonging to any other power. We ask only to be let alone in the peaceful possession of our own territory and in the peaceful working-out of our own destiny. While this is true, we dare not lose sight of the fact that we cannot control the actions, aspirations, and ambitions of other lands; and if they undertake aggressive warfare against us, we must be prepared to defend ourselves and our sovereignty.

To do this we must have armies, navies, and marine corps. They must have able and well-trained officers, who are familiar with military tactics and the strategy of armed conflict. Whence are these officers to come? Whence their training? As partial answer to these questions, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps has been devised as an integral part of our national defense.

In modern warfare millions of enlisted men are required—man power is just as essential today as it ever was in the past. For great armies of this size hundreds of thousands of commissioned officers are necessary. They must be trained to lead. And the better they are trained, the better chance the men under them have to survive. Only a limited number of officers can be educated at the great service academies at West Point and Annapolis. There must accordingly be other facilities provided—and at not too great cost. To supply this need the R.O.T.C. system came into existence. What is it? In more than a hundred land-grant colleges and higher educational institutions students are enrolled in the R.O.T.C. work.

The curriculum consists of a 4-year course. There is a basic and an advanced course, each of 2 years' duration. The work of the basic course consists of 96 hours during the academic year—3 hours per week—of which 60 hours are devoted to practical exercises out of doors when the weather permits, while 36 hours are used for theoretical instruction in the classroom.

While the basic course is required of freshmen and sophomores at 80 of the 126 institutions maintaining senior units of the R.O.T.C., the advanced course is entirely optional and operates on a schedule of 5 hours per week for both junior and senior years.

What is the practical result of this training? Just this: Thousands of young men who are educated to command and lead are graduated every year from the several institutions. They take their place in the country's civil life during peace time; but if emergency should arise, they are ready in an instant to don the uniform and assume the position for which they have been trained in the defensive forces of the country.

If the national defense were to lose the services of the R.O.T.C., we would find ourselves utterly without adequate officer personnel in event we should be attacked by hostile forces. To properly train officers requires months and even years. Such delay in getting our forces into the conflict certainly would be costly and might even be fatal. This is not an overstatement in any sense of the word.

Most of those now living retain a vivid recollection of what transpired during the World War. We entered the conflict in the spring of 1917 and at the time were utterly unprepared. But let me quote the words of Lt. Gen. Robert Lee Bullard in this connection. It will be remembered that this distinguished general commanded the American Second Army in France and, therefore, knows whereof he speaks. In passing it might be well to mention also that he is now president of the National Security League, still interested in the safety of the country for which he offered his life.

Says General Bullard: "In 1917 the United States was almost 100 percent disarmed in the seven major weapons—field artillery, automatic rifles, machine guns, planes, tanks, hand grenades, and automatic pistols. Our entire Army personnel was little more than half the number of officers alone required in 1918."

Five times in history we were as unprepared as any pacifist could ask, and wars followed. In major wars we have paid heavy death penalties for 2 years because of lack of technically trained officer personnel.

We are the seventeenth military power today in Regulars and trained Reserves.

The wealthiest nation, we are last in number of soldiers in proportion to wealth.

If 15 years' improvements have been so great that our war-time artillery * * * are only "souvenirs", 14 months after the next war starts we could begin to deliver new artillery.

And now Communists, pacifists, economists, and even churchmen are striking at the R.O.T.C. The Communists at least know what they are doing. The Communist bylaws and manuals lay down the rule that abolition of military training and the breaking of the loyalty of the Army are essential steps toward civil war.

America probably has no more vulnerable spot for attack than the R.O.T.C. In it are enrolled 127,000 students in 326 schools. Since we maintain such a small standing Army and have of Regular officers one twentieth of the number required for a major war, we must depend chiefly on the R.O.T.C. for the training and commanding of a citizen army.

To an amazing degree we did depend on student officers in 1917–18.

At that time 9,600 Regular Army and National Guard officers faced the superhuman task of building a citizen army of 4,000,000 enlisted men and nearly 200,000 officers.

It was fortunate indeed for us that in 53 land-grant colleges there had been Officers' Training Corps. Recent accurate data from 39 revealed that they furnished us with 15 major generals, 28 brigadier generals, 154 colonels, 320 lieutenant colonels, 1,157 majors, 4,790 captains, and 18,973 lieutenants.

The 53 colleges, it is estimated, furnished 40,000 commissioned officers and more than 50,000 noncoms. In other words, the R.O.T.C. furnished as many as all other sources combined.

Continues General Bullard: "Communists, receiving orders and 'manuals' from abroad, know what they are doing when they strike—as at New York City College—at the R.O.T.C. But loyal American citizens should not be deluded into joining or lending sympathy to these campaigns.

"When honest, but short-sighted, advocates of economy consider the R.O.T.C. budget, I suggest that they first note that this institution which furnished half of our officers in 1917–18, costs annually a sum equivalent to 3 cents—the price of a postage stamp—per citizen.

"Earnest, well-meaning opponents of war, and many members of religious bodies, join, more or less, in agitation against military training in schools. Such individuals, doubtless, are parents of sons. Let them consider this:

"In France, Private John Smith was commanded by a trained officer. Private Bill Jones' commander was a new officer. The statistics show that John had about a 35-percent better chance of coming home than did Bill.

"We are all opposed to war. But disarmament does not prevent it. Influenced by that fallacy, America has been virtually disarmed five times. Wars followed immediately. We needlessly sacrificed scores of thousands, victims of unpreparedness.

"Each time we have indulged in the 'costly luxury' of unpreparedness, eminent men have been ready to assure us that there would be no more war. They have been wrong; as was David Starr Jordan, when in June 1914 he vigorously denied the possibility of European war.

"Such men habitually argue that armies and navies, generals and admirals 'make war.' Not in these modern times! Peoples make war. Theirs is the decision. It then becomes the duty of our armed forces to restore peace—which civilian leadership has been unable to maintain.

"Civilian leadership very nearly 'made' a war with Japan only recently on the occasion of our interference in the Manchurian question, though our naval and military leaders knew quite well that we were not adequately prepared for such a war if it came.

"If we insist, as a national policy, on a small standing army, then we must have officer personnel around which an army can be built. The R.O.T.C., better than any other institution, meets that need. We should guard it zealously now.

"Fortunately, the overwhelming majority of the students of our colleges have only contempt for the Communist-inspired, radical agitation against the R.O.T.C. And the 'I-will-not-fight' ballots cast have been almost microscopic in size when compared with total enrollments.

"But the extension of Communist, pacifist, and unpreparedness agitation into the colleges raises a grave issue."

If any man in America should know the value of preparadness, it is General Bullard. He has given his life to close study of the subject. It is for that reason that I am quoting him so extensively.

Says this spokesman for national defense: "The error of a great many Americans is to assume that conferences pacify—and disarm. True, we disarm. And every time a conference convenes—or reconvenes—with oratory which seems to promise that swords will be beaten into plowshares tomorrow morning, there occurs a new burst of activity by pacifists and internationalists within the United States."

The most recent pacifist attack has occurred in the colleges. There have been so-called "antijingo" campaigns against the Reserve Officers' Training Corps. In a score of colleges there have been antiwar votes taken, students being asked to declare that under no circumstances would they fight for their country!

There is unquestionable evidence that much of the subversive propaganda which has led to attacks on the R.O.T.C. and to antiwar-service votes in the colleges has come from Communist headquarters in our cities.

But a certain portion of the students listen to this propaganda—including the old fallacy that disarmament insures peace—and are convinced.

I wish they would reread their history books. Many elders as well need a lesson. We certainly have tried unpreparedness, as these experiences indicate:

First. Thomas Jefferson believed in unpreparedness. There were but 6,600 men in United States Army uniforms in July 1812. That force had to be expanded almost one-hundredfold, to 527,000 total.

Because the smoke of British-built fires could not be removed from walls of the President's official residence, it was given a coat of paint and became "the White House." The smoke stains are still there beneath the paint. Then Jefferson advocated military training in the schools.

Second. In the early forties our Army was reduced to 8,000, and shortly thereafter our forces were outnumbered 3 to 1 in the first two battles with the invading Mexicans.

Third. Soon after that war pacifism and economy cut the Army to 16,744, and that figure had to be multiplied by 200—to 2,228,000 Federal soldiers—during the Civil War.

Fourth. Our forces numbered about 20,000 before the Spanish War, and the meagerness of the American Army influenced Spain in its war decision.

Of course, the outstanding American in the World War was Gen. John J. Pershing. To him was intrusted the task of organizing America's vast Army for service "over there." He was the gallant Commander in Chief of the American Expeditionary Forces. To his leadership were intrusted millions of the country's bravest young men. No one's counsel is entitled to greater respect than his in matters of this kind. Because of the great weight his opinion should carry, therefore, I quote his words:

"I am very happy to learn that the R.O.T.C. Association of the United States proposes to meet an imperative need by issuing a booklet for general use in support of military training and education in our schools and colleges.

"In the restlessness and the instability of youth lies the greatest danger to any government. Unless guided and directed along rational and patriotic paths, then security for the future is endangered. Work and association under the self-imposed discipline of the military-training courses should inevitably result in a new sense of patriotic obligation and the development of higher moral standards, which in turn must exert an important influence among our people. This voluntary service makes for better citizens and strengthens American power and prestige.

"The program for military training takes on a national importance from the sole viewpoint of citizenship, and calls for the most earnest consideration of every thinking man and woman. The principles underlying the undertaking are sound and its success will be productive of permanent and beneficial results. Its approval comes from loyal citizens who recognize its necessity. Its support comes from those who stood helpless and unready, but valiant, in the face of a world calamity. These men belong to no class or clique; they are business men and men from all walks of life, practical men who apply common sense to their everyday problems.

"I regard the system of military training in all of its phases as a wonderful school for the development of the ideal virtues required for good citizenship."

Finally, I deem it advisable to quote the words of Frederick B. Robinson, president of the College of the City of New York. Because of his peculiar environment, radicals flourish all around him and the Communists are extremely active in their subversive efforts to overthrow constitutional government in this country. Says this distinguished educator: "I believe that the organization and maintenance of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps in American colleges is most desirable and wholesome. Although a member of various committees working to establish peace and ultimate disarmament through international agreements, it is my opinion that the United States must at this time maintain adequate national defense. It would be unwise to support a professional standing army of size sufficient to defend us. Indeed, the Nation could not afford a program of this sort. The present program of a small standing Army with trained reserves and a National Guard is a good one.

To make available for young men in college, education which will fit them to serve as officers in the case of national necessity is wise. These young men constitute a group whose lives are not interfered with at all by the arrangement, who are not withdrawn from industry or hampered in their general progress. Furthermore, as a group they are the least likely to be militaristic in the undesirable sense, while at the same time their general intelligence is such as to make them most valuable in the event that they should be required for national service.

The training itself is good in that it develops a spirit of cooperation and reasonable obedience, ready response to necessary command, and willingness to cooperate in undertakings which must of necessity be organized and properly led. I observe that the work of the R.O.T.C. improves the posture and bearing of the young men and also has an excellent effect upon their manners and attitude toward their elders and superiors.

There are, of course, certain details in the actual program of study which might be considered and improved from time to time. The R.O.T.C. also has its problems arising from individual peculiarities in the personnel. These problems, though, are common to all organizations and activities of life. The influence of the R.O.T.C. is, on the whole, beneficial to the individual, the college, and the Nation.

The purpose of this conference today is to bring together the patriotic, civic, and fraternal societies of the United States, into closer cooperation, in opposing the combined efforts of the pacifist, Socialist, and Communist organizations and movements designed to bring about the abolition of the R.O.T.C. and all forms of military training, by stressing the constitutional obligations of citizenship in relation to national defense.

Our Government is founded on the principle of mutual benefits through mutual public service by its citizens. Otherwise it could not have been established, nor could it be maintained.

The Constitution having imposed the obligation "to raise and support armies", such plans as it adopts in so doing impose a constitutional obligation on the part of the classes of citizens so included to serve in the defense of the country by bearing arms, if necessary, if and when called upon so to do. In the Selective Draft Law cases (Arver v. United States, 245 U.S. 366), Chief Justice White, speaking for the Court, said: "The very conception of a just government and its duty to the citizen includes the reciprocal obligation of the citizen to render military service in case of need. Whatever tends to lessen the willingness of citizens to discharge their duty to bear arms in the country's defense detracts from the strength and safety of the government."

In a later case, that of United States v. Rosika Schwimmer (279 U.S. 644), Mr. Justice Butler, delivering the opinion of the Court, said: "That it is the duty of the citizen by force of arms to defend our Government against all enemies whenever necessity arises is a fundamental principle of the Constitution." Justice Butler quoted with approval the language of the decision in Jacobson v. Massachusetts (197 U.S. 11), as follows: "This court, speaking of the liberties guaranteed to the individual by the fourteenth amendment, said: '* * * and yet he may be compelled, by force if need be, against his will and without regard to his personal wishes or his peculiar interests, or even his religious or political convictions, to take his place in the ranks of the Army and risk the chance of being shot down in its defense.'"

Reserve Officers' Training Corps students are not members of the Military Establishment of the United States, as they take no oath or other obligation, nor are they enlisted in the Army of the United States. They assume no more obligation to serve the country in case of war than does the student refusing or neglecting to take military training in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps. Under section 1, chapter 1, title 32, of the United States Code, the militia is divided into three parts, the National Guard, Naval Militia, and the unorganized militia, and under section 81a, chapter 5, title 32, of the United States Code, the President is authorized to order the militia not a part of the National Guard into the service of the United States, if necessary, for a period of 9 months. Therefore, the young man refusing to take military training is just as liable to military service as is the young man who takes such training, the difference being the student who takes such instruction is the better prepared to discharge his highest obligation of citizenship with multifold benefits to his country and himself.

It is but the exercise of good sense to take the subject of military education by such scholars as are able to obtain it, especially if they can do so at the expense of the Government.

As Mr. Justice White said in the Selective Draft Law cases, "Whatever tends to lessen the willingness of citizens to discharge their duty to bear arms in the country's defense detracts from the strength and safety of the Government." This brief, candid, and logical statement by one of our foremost jurists very definitely characterizes those seeking to prevent the young men of America from properly preparing themselves to discharge the first and most important constitutional duty imposed upon them.

Under the Constitution and statutes the President has power to excuse bona fide conscientious objectors from combat service, but under no provision of either the Constitution or statutes of this country can male citizens otherwise qualified be exempted from military service.

Since all able-bodied male citizens and aliens who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 18 and 45 years are on precisely the same legal basis in respect to their obligation to serve the country in time of war, and since that obligation is the very foundation stone upon which the Constitution and our form of government rests, it is unpatriotic to encourage unpreparedness and disobedience to the highest requirement of American citizenship.

Our most fervent wish is to have peace with all the world, but in order to assure it we must be prepared at all times to defend ourselves if attacked. Only thus may we feel secure in the permanent enjoyment of our free institutions and our constitutional liberty.

FOREIGN COTTON PRODUCTION

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, in view of numerous statements which have been made recently about the effect of foreign production of cotton by reason of our reduction-of-surplus program, I desire to have inserted in the RECORD an article by F. L. Teuton, appearing in the Southern Agriculturist, entitled "Foreign Cotton Production."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Southern Agriculturist]

FOREIGN COTTON PRODUCTION—HOW WILL OUR ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM AFFECT IT?

By F. L. Teuton

Will the cotton-adjustment program cause an increase in foreign production? Some say "yes" and some say "no." So, for the benefit of those interested in this matter, Southern Agriculturist presents a brief word picture of the cotton situation.

For several years the world has produced an average of about 26,000,000 bales of cotton a year. The United States produced about 15,000,000 bales, or approximately 60 percent of the total, and the rest of the world produced about 11,000,000 bales, or 40 percent of the production.

We produced 18,000,000 bales of cotton in 1926. We can raise that to 20,000,000 bales without much difficulty; and with a little effort the economists tell us that we can just about produce the world supply of cotton right here in the United States. We not only have the land, the climate, and the experience for growing cotton but we have modern gin facilities, transportation, and other advantages that some of our foreign competitors don't have. C. A. Cobb, Chief of the Cotton Section of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, says that we are not only the biggest cotton-producing country in the world but that we can hold that place in spite of propaganda intended to scare us into believing something else.

But there are always two sides to a case. So let's face the facts and see where we stand. The United States first. We can expand production whenever we get ready. That's settled. We can improve quality, as we have in the last 5 years, if that is needed. But there is one thing we can't do. We can't use all the cotton we produce. Only about half of it. We depend on other countries to buy the rest. That's why we're interested in the foreign situation.

OUR FOREIGN COMPETITORS

Now, let's go abroad. Three things determine foreign production. First, is the amount of land that can be planted to cotton under favorable conditions. Second, is the need for food crops and the disinclination of the people to grow cotton at the expense of food. And third, is the price of cotton. Let's look at our foreign competitors now in the light of these three things. India first.

India is the second largest cotton-producing country in the world. She produces about 4,000,000 bales a year, or about one third as much as we do, and takes about 25,000,000 acres to do it. The most she ever produced was 5,201,000 bales. Most of India's cotton land is old, the farms small, averaging from 3 to 5 acres each, and the yield low, ranging from 60 to 100 pounds of lint cotton per acre. We don't know a great deal about India's potential cotton land. Irrigation possibilities will determine that. We're studying them now. India's main problem is to feed 320,000,000 people. That in itself prevents her from making sharp or substantial shifts in her crop acreage. The general opinion is that expansion will be slow unless high prices cause her to bring in large areas of irrigated land or to produce cotton at the expense of food crops.

CHINA, TOO, NEEDS FOOD

China is our next competitor. So much of her cotton is consumed in homes in the interior without passing through commercial trade channels that it is hard to get an accurate figure on either her acreage or her production. Her production is usually given at about 2,000,000 bales a year. But P. O. Nyhus, a Department of Agriculture field man, who has made a personal study of the Chinese situation, says that it is undoubtedly more than that. He says the amount of land in China that can grow cotton is far greater than the amount now planted to cotton. But that the Chinese farmer's first interest is to grow food; that poor transportation makes it hazardous to depend on food from outside of his own district; and that it is doubtful if our adjustment program will influence the situation one way or another unless the price of cotton rises far beyond present levels.

Egypt is next. She produces about a million and a half bales a year. The most she ever produced was 1,768,000 bales. P. K. Norris, our foreign cotton specialist, who has made a personal study of the Egyptian situation, says that Egypt's cotton acreage varies a great deal from year to year—sometimes as much as 50 percent—and that 2,160,000 acres is just about the limit of her cotton land under present conditions. Anything beyond that would be at the expense of food crops, and not followed as a fixed policy.

However, Egypt, like India, China, and the United States, has additional land that would produce cotton if irrigated. But that's expensive, and requires years to complete, and is undoubtedly a long way off if built solely to expand cotton acreage. So Mr. Norris says that our program of adjusted production is not likely to affect the Egyptian situation very much one way or another unless we go too far, or continue it too long. And we don't expect to do either. But there is one thing that we ought to watch in Egypt. And that is her announced intention of increasing the proportion of her shorter staples to bring them in direct competition with our longer staples. The decline in the use of laces, and the new methods of making automobile tires from shorter staples has undoubtedly decreased the demand for Egypt's longer staples, and she is doing what any other country would probably do under similar conditions—shifting to meet the new deal.

HOW ABOUT RUSSIA?

Now for Russia. We've heard much about Russia's cotton program. But that was when she was expanding production, and trying to produce cotton in new regions with cold climate. The venture was not satisfactory. The most she ever produced was 1,889,000 bales. She recently reduced her acreage about 10 percent and is now producing most of her cotton back in her old cotton belt—the deserts of Turkestan. Most of this is produced under irrigation. And that's expensive. If Russia is producing her own supply now, the future growth of her population will necessitate either a further expansion of production, which proved difficult during the last 3 years, or a revival of imports. Which way she will turn, nobody knows.

Brazil produces cotton, too. Her production averages about a half million bales a year. The rumor is that she has a lot of land that will produce cotton under favorable conditions. P. K. Norris is down there now. And we'll know more about that when he returns in July.

Mexico and Peru produce cotton also. In fact, more than 50 countries produce some cotton. But our biggest competitors in the order named are India, China, Egypt, Russia, and Brazil. Many of the other countries are marginal countries. Within limits they increase production when the price is favorable, and decrease it when the price is unfavorable.

Of the three things that control production, namely, land, the need for food crops, and price—price is undoubtedly the most important. Lawrence Myers, cotton economist of the Department of Agriculture, says that any increase in the price of cotton tends to stimulate production and that the increase benefits foreign producers as well as us. He says that foreign production has increased in the past when the price was high enough. And he believes it will increase again if the price rises high enough. But what is that price? Some say 15 cents, some more, and some less. Nobody knows exactly what it is, and your guess is about as good as the other fellow's. It's all mixed up with the relative price of other crops, the value of the dollar, and so on. The thing to remember is that we could not go on reducing production and raising prices indefinitely without encouraging foreign production.

Undoubtedly the main reason for the foreign-expansion scare is the increase that occurred last year in Egypt, China, India, Brazil, and Mexico. But that can hardly be called an expansion, since in most cases it was merely a return to, or toward, normal production after 1 or 2 years of reduced production. And if it hadn't been for reduced production abroad, the total supply of cotton would be a lot bigger than it is.

SUMMING UP

As a matter of fact, the supply of foreign cotton is more in line with what it normally is than the supply of American cotton. On the average, American cotton makes up about 55 percent of the world supply. But for the last 2 years it has made up 65 percent of the supply, much of which we still have in our warehouses. So the economists tell us that we can stand a reduction for a time, even at the expense of the little foreign expansion that may occur, in order to get rid of the American surplus and get us back in line with supply and demand.

The general opinion among cotton economists is that we may have a little increase abroad if the price is favorable, but that we can stand it for a year or two until we get back on an even keel. And since the object of the program is to reduce production only until we are back in line, and then return to normal production, the economists see no reason for becoming unduly alarmed over the foreign situation. The Secretary of Agriculture can declare the program off and let us return to maximum production whenever he thinks it necessary. And with our natural advantages in producing cotton, we can make it hard for any country that enters the race against us.

Our Government has an eye on the foreign situation. The Bureau of Agricultural Economics has been studying it for several years. We have men in the foreign fields now making regular reports. In short, the Government is doing everything possible to protect the interests of the American cotton farmer.

THE MONETARY SYSTEM—ARTICLE BY FRANK E. JOHNESSE

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a very valuable article by Mr. Frank E. Johnesse, of Boise, Idaho, a mining engineer and a student of monetary matters.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ECONOMICS, THE LIFEBLOOD OF INDUSTRY, SOCIETY, AND HUMAN ENDEAVOR, DEPENDS UPON THE MONETARY SYSTEM INVOLVED

Our Government's greatest troubles and failures are involved in its economic field.

Economics is the philosophy of human industry, of the relativity of exchange between human endeavors, and therefore rests upon the monetary system involved.

According to economic laws, certain causes under certain conditions produce certain effects. They are, however, independent of human opinion and make no allowance for human desire, sentiment, or human emotion.

The philosophy of economics is nature's law. Nature always stands firm, and man must accommodate himself to her conditions. Therefore economics must rest on the nature of things as they are and not on the assertion of what man thinks they should be.

Nature never deceives, although man's judgment as to what nature is may sometime be at fault.

If economics is not based upon accurate observation, it becomes a riot of futile, mythical, and conflicting ideas, and unnatural urges to do or prove something for some particular group or purpose.

Government operations can in no way escape economic laws. It may change economic conditions, but it cannot in any way stop the inevitable consequence of economic laws.

A government economic system to function satisfactorily must be based upon a logical and practical monetary system (money, the medium of exchange, representing wealth). And as all wealth is created by applying labor to nature's products, labor is the basis of all wealth, and the purchasing power of money or its exchange value must be based thereon.

In order that the exchange or purchasing power of a national or international currency or medium of exchange may function equitably, the natural law of relativity must also be taken into consideration and allowed to function.

Economics has become a science, and advanced civilization can no longer recognize the traditional jewel, token, or precious metal as their medium of exchange. It must be a compensated medium redeemable in essential commodities at a fixed relative value.

An economic system should be judged by its efficiency in the production of commodities, the equity of its system of distribution, and by its ethical, social, and human byproducts. But we must not overlook the fact that in a commercialized world, such as this has grown to be, the money subject is the paramount issue—the one thing upon which the success or failure of the system depends.

The productivity of industry is the most important criterion of the worth of an economic system, and it is generally conceded that the inefficiency of our present monetary system is the one thing in particular that has so sorely depressed our industrial and economic activities.

Regardless of what the reason for the labor urge may be, nature is man's only source of subsistence. Nature does not give any person anything for nothing. Everything wrested from nature requires labor. It is nature's universal law.

Labor must be both physical and mental. Some one has said, "There is no such thing as mere physical labor. The difference between so-called 'mental and physical labor' is merely one of degree. Even the simplest form of physical exertion requires some mental effort, and all labor must be directed. Both brawn and brain are necessary to make the world go. Probably less than 15 percent of our people are capable of real thinking; therefore, there is much more brawn available than brains. It is a matter of common observation that brain work usually receives a higher wage than physical labor. If conditions were just reversed and 85 percent of our people were high in brains and low in physical strength, and only 15 percent high in physical strength and low in brains, then the physical labor would be the one in most demand and would receive the higher wages."

The term "wealth" we apply to anything that has been secured, processed, and modified by human exertion so as to fit in for the gratification of human desires. Wealth does not reside in the object itself, but in the human desire for getting the object. That is, there is no such thing as absolute wealth, and the wealth attribute depends entirely upon human opinion actuated by desire and demand.

A government may put any kind of currency or circulating medium into circulation, but it is utterly powerless by any fiat to give it the purchasing power of any fixed standard.

Economics originated when primitive man first exchanged a coconut for a bunch of bananas.

Then followed barter and trade (exchanging kind for kind), which was carried on until organized government developed, when the necessity for a medium of exchange of some kind evolved. Gold being an indestructible precious metal of limited quantity in existence at the time, it was used as such, and later on given a fixed exchange value, and all obligations, both public and private were made payable therein.

At various periods in history silver has been associated with gold, and for about 700 years, between the seventh and fourteenth centuries, silver alone was the sole standard. Since 1873 gold has been recognized by leading nations and the commercial world as the universal standard of value and exchange. But business and commercial intercourse having expanded out of all proportion with the increase in gold production, the supply has become wholly inadequate and it has gradually ceased to be used as a circulating medium and is being hoarded by nations, corporate interests, and individuals. As a result it has ceased to function as a relative standard on anything like an equitable basis. The public no longer associates the dollar with gold, and its exchange value and purchasing power has varied in recent years from 100 to 1,000 percent. With such an erratic monetary standard a practical and logical economic system is impossible.

Therefore, to provide an equitable standard of value it must be based upon the average relative cost in labor of essential commodities of a sufficient number to provide the necessary stability and relativity, and of those that are interchangeable, indestructible, and indispensable to the maintenance and progress of science and industry.

The cause of the extreme variability of the exchange value of our established monetary standard in the past has been due to the fact that it has been confined to gold alone, or gold and silver only, and of which there has always been an insufficient supply. Gold has never had an intrinsic value; and while silver has, it alone cannot provide for the average relative commodity cost. Consequently labor, which is the source of all wealth, is left out of the picture, and the natural laws of relativity and economics cannot function.

For any government to say that their dollar or medium of exchange is based on something substantial is futile. The only thing that will make it worth something substantial is its actual conversion, and this depends on the amount of labor or commodity the people will part with in exchange therefor.

All the gold and silver coinage and bullion in the United States represent but 1.4 percent of the total wealth in the Nation. Therefore a monetary system which provides that all obligations, both private and public, are payable in either one or both, cannot possibly have the necessary stability and credit backing to provide a stable commodity price level.

In the recent past we have tried to make credit serve our purpose instead of broadening the basis of our monetary system; but credit is not wealth, and increasing or extending credit does not increase our total wealth. As someone has said, "Credit may be likened to a rubber band that may be stretched to cover more surface without, however, increasing the total content, and in this stretching process it becomes thinner, more fragile, and more likely to break", which is precisely what happened to our credit system in October 1929.

For a government to undertake to curtail production is most illogical. The urgent need of the world today is for human beings to do more work and increase production. There will be no question about consumption if only they are allowed to exchange products on an equitable basis. This can be provided only by a broad and equitable monetary system which must be based upon a fixed relative price of several interchangeable, indispensable, and indestructible commodities, which must necessarily be composed chiefly of the leading industrial metals, such as silver, copper, lead, zinc, and iron, with gold to be used simply as the pivot point from which the relative value of the other metals included is to be based. Call it multimetalism. As to what the price of gold is fixed at is of little consequence so long as it is not variable.

To continue gold inflation or to go back on the single gold standard with gold at any price will only prolong existing conditions.

The existing unprecedented economic depression has drifted along to well within its fifth year, and to date nothing has been done that gives any assurance of lasting relief.

Without revolution society moves slow, and the inherited creeds and prejudices of humanity are modified and changed only by a very slow process of evolution, if at all.

A society that is not willing to modify its processes and relationships to conform to new situations cannot endure indefinitely.

The pioneers of our Nation established institutions in accordance with their needs, and as a result we advanced far to the front in the march of progress. But, like the orientals, modern America has fallen into idolatry, bound to tradition, and its reverence to irresponsible power is leading us into stagnation. We are paying deference to a traditional system of law that respects established customs at the expense of society. In spite of the wonderful scientific strides made within the recent past, we still cling tenaciously to an outworn medieval monetary system.

Not even those who suffer from the limitations of a social or economic system are easily persuaded to change it, because they are usually too ignorant to discover the basic rather than the superficial and incidental causes of their distress. This is particularly true of the United States where the great wealth of the Nation obscures the defects of the system. The question then arises: Can society gain sufficient social intelligence to modify the existing system step by step as the need arises and as traditional methods become unworkable, or whether through the stubbornness and blindness of the holders of power and privilege and through the ignorance of the masses the system will be permitted to disintegrate until change can come only through social convulsion and revolution?

The single gold standard, with the price at any level, is impractical and illogical and will not provide the necessary stability. Gold, because of its high value and low cost of transportation, is essentially a regulator fund and should be used only as such and not as a backing fund. It functions chiefly in being used and, to the extent that it is used, to adjust the supply of currency and circulating credit to the changing demands of trade. If we could only get our Government authorities to realize the fallacy of binding the Nation to a system that cannot possibly function as a sane and sound national or international monetary system, it would open the way for the modernization of our entire economic system with inspiring results.

Inflating consumption is of far greater importance at this time than the inflation of commodity prices, and that is just where we are making the mistake. Under existing conditions, people in every walk of life are gradually coming to live on a lower scale. They are consuming less, and they will continue to do so until we adopt a monetary system that will function in the interest of the masses without discriminating barriers.

It is an established fact that the money or medium of exchange used by any nation, is the most profound, potent, and far-reaching influence affecting the general and individual welfare and prosperity of the people of that nation. In fact, this having become a commercialized world, it is the life blood of every phase of society and human endeavor. History records many instances where nations have been wrecked as a result of an unjust or inadequate monetary system.

The monetary policies, legislation, and practices of our Nation have for many decades been almost wholly dictated by a comparatively small number of great banking, money-lending, and money-manipulating interests. The judgment of the general run of the people has seldom been consulted, little considered, and usually ignored by the small number of persons in control of our monetary legislation and administration. These same persons now aspire, in cooperation with similar groups in other nations, to world-wide financial dominion, and are creating a system wherein the United States will be but one of the service stations under their control and subject to their absolute dictation.

The men and influences in control have had many years of almost unlimited power in which to demonstrate the wisdom or folly of their policy and administration. It has resulted in the concentration of wealth, to the detriment of the masses, and the building of colossal fortunes in the ownership of a comparatively few; fortunes so vast and increasing so rapidly that one stands appalled at their magnitude and rapidity of increase; fortunes so vast that their owners, when well-intentioned toward society, must apparently permit their continued growth through a very dearth of opportunities of sufficient size to effect a wide distribution of their holdings without injury to the affairs and the morale of the people; fortunes so vast that, if held by those of unwise or vicious intentions toward their fellow humans, are capable of being the means of wide-spread harm and demoralization; fortunes which, unless widely scattered and distributed, will possibly and very probably be the creative source of a great permanent class of worthless idlers, forever a drain upon the labor and industry of others.

General business is always in a precarious state under the present financial system, with its alternate fevers of expansion and chills of contraction. Labor, in its varied forms, has its comparative good times and then a siege of enforced idleness that eats up the savings possibly set aside to meet the needs of the declining years of life.

Our money system, as it has been created and operated by those long in control, has utterly failed to meet the needs of the masses. It functions crudely, both in times of peace and in times of war. It is a system of instability instead of stability and certainty. The value of our money as measured in average purchasing power, instead of being as stable and fixed as the law of gravitation and as it should be, it is, on the contrary, as unstable and treacherous as the shifting sands of the Sahara Desert, robbing first the debtor and then the creditor, and seldom or never preserving the just equities of average business calculations and obligations.

Our monetary system has lagged far behind in the progress of the various phases of our governmental structure. It, more than all other causes combined, is responsible for the existing world-wide depression.

Those groups and factions that have been chief manipulators in devising and in our adherence to the present system stand in self-confessed helplessness, unable to give any tangible assurance of even temporary relief, much less a permanent remedy. They are afraid that the adoption of any new or radical change may rob them of their prestige.

The greed of selfish wealth accumulation is arrogant and well-nigh insatiable. During the war it not only took every precaution to prevent the drafting of capital to harmonize with the drafting of man power, but it took advantage of every opportunity of aggrandizement. At a time when the Nation was becoming almost hopelessly involved in debt, the great private and corporate accumulations multiplied and mounted skyward.

They have now become so powerful that we have the amazing spectacle of prominent Government officials practically confessing that they must be given full rein to accumulate and hold, without limit or restraint. Threat has been carefully conveyed that unless such concessions were recognized and approved, that the welfare of the people would be further hampered and curtailed by a refusal of the money service now furnished by means of the so-called "loans and investments" of private and corporate capital, and the Federal Reserve Banking System. That any power exists to demand such concessions, or exact such penalty, is proof of the need for great readjustments in the present money system and service.

Our aim should be the establishment of a money system and service upon a basis in full harmony with the letter and spirit of popular government, as set forth so admirably in the preamble to the Constitution of the United States, "In order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

The main objective of our monetary system, as well as that of every other factor in our governmental structure, should be in conformity with the Golden Rule, which is real democracy.

Our Government has long ago ceased to function as a democracy. It has become capitalistic, but cannot endure for long in this day and age. Unless the necessary radical changes are brought about at an early date under the existing system, it will come as a result of revolution.

The money of a nation must be regulated for the public good and not for private or corporate profit. In providing such we must get far away from tradition and outworn theories and get down to fundamentals. We need a monetary system that will provide a compensated commodity dollar—a dollar or medium of exchange that will function equitably, nationally and internationally.

To undertake to stabilize the dollar by the revaluation of gold and to continue to use it as a standard and medium of exchange will only prolong this terrible industrial panic and necessity for the N.I.R.A. program, which at best will soon have reached its limitations.

Monometalism (the single gold standard) is the thing of the past. We are in dire need of a logical, practical modernized monetary system. Multimetalism—explained in brief in conclusion—is the logical solution.

While multimetalism has never been tried out and its feasibility demonstrated, no other plan so far proposed comes anywhere near providing so sound a method; and while it may not prove perfect, it will without a doubt prove to be far superior to any plan ever devised or adopted by any nation in the past. It is the only plan upon which an international monetary system that will function satisfactorily can be based. Its early adoption by our own Nation will at once start us on the short cut back to prosperity with such startling results that other nations looking for a logical way out and not bound by tradition and the greed and narrowness of the dominating class will quickly fall in line. Right now multimetalism is our salvation. It will also tend to obliterate extreme national independence and lead the world on to a broader application of interdependence and internationalism, as it should.

It matters not what system we may finally decide to try out (unless it should be a return to the gold standard); there will develop a strong reactionary force that will resort to every means within their power to defeat it. However, should we return to the single gold standard, defeat will be inevitable.

The first step toward multimetalism is to peg gold at some fixed price and remonetize silver at the old ratio of 16 to 1 or thereabout. Then fix the relative price of copper, lead, zinc, and iron at the proper level therewith, and we will then have revolutionized, modernized, harmonized, and stabilized our monetary system.

MULTIMETALISM IN BRIEF

For a broader and more stable metal backing to our monetary system we should include along with gold not only silver but at least four of the most important industrial metals, copper, lead, zinc, and iron.

Then peg gold at some fixed price in dollars from which there can be no variation; then fix a relative labor or production cost price on the other five metals at something like a normal 10-year price average.

Issue multimetal certificates in various denominations for our circulating currency, to be redeemable in any one or more of the said six metals at their fixed relative prices, and all debts, public and private, payable therein.

Have a Federal currency control board with power to gradually vary the relative value of any of the said metals other than gold, if necessary, to conform to extreme variation in supply and demand.

The Government to certify to the production of all the said six metals hereafter produced in the Nation and charge a certification fee of, say, 15 percent on gold, 10 percent on silver, and 5 percent on the other four.

A like certification fee could well be imposed on the production of all other metals. They constitute real wealth coming from the earth which is the natural birthright of the people. It would therefore be just and felt less than mostly any other form of tax. It would also provide a large percentage of the necessary income.

Under this system the relative price of all commodities could be brought to any desired level because under such a system the relative average price level of all commodities would conform to the relative labor cost of the six metals and would become stable.

It will provide a most ideal international monetary system and an international medium of exchange, and check the growing tendency toward nationalism, which is much to be desired.

We are living in the metal age. The progress of science and industry is dependent upon the use of metals. With these industrial metals functioning as a monetary standard, they will be used to a very large extent in commodity exchange and thereby greatly increase our international commercial intercourse.

Under multimetalism the extreme variation in the purchasing power of our standard of value, such as experienced under the single gold standard, could not occur.

Once it is adopted, details as to price, certification fees, etc., can very easily be worked out to conform to existing conditions, and we will then have paved the way for a rapid recovery from our present ills.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the protection of the municipal water supply of the city of Salt Lake City, State of Utah."

AMENDMENT OF DISTRICT ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGE CONTROL ACT

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business in order that I may call up two District of Columbia bills, which I am sure will lead to no discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H.R. 8854) to amend the District of Columbia Alcoholic Beverage Control Act by amending sections 11, 22, 23, and 24.

This bill was introduced in the House and after hearings was reported back to the House and passed. It was considered by the Senate committee and unanimously approved.

Broadly speaking, the bill is to meet a situation not anticipated when the law which this amends was enacted. Evasions to that law have occurred, and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia prepared and recommended the passage of the bill under consideration in order that these evasions might be prevented. The information brought to the attention of the committee indicates that the District is losing considerable money each day through failure to obtain taxes to which it is entitled. Broadly speaking, the bill seeks to amend an existing law only by providing for the placing of stamps upon containers containing the liquors authorized to be sold under the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act. To accomplish this result, the bill was drafted in such form as to reenact a number of the sections of the original law with a few verbal changes therein.

The purpose of this bill is to change the method of collecting taxes on liquor in the District of Columbia from the present system of reporting to a stamp-tax system. At present the licensee is required to report on or before the 10th of each month the amount of the tax for the preceding month. We have no way of checking except through his books. Obviously this method is easily susceptible of evasion. We propose that stamps be placed on containers to indicate the payment of the tax.

The sections of the present law which relate to the payment and collection of tax are sections 22, 23, and 24. This bill rewrites these sections, the provisions being as follows:

Section 2 permits the Commissioners to discontinue the making of the reports relative to taxes required by the present law.

Section 3 rewrites section 23 of the present act, as follows:

(a) Levies the tax at exactly the same rates as the present law.

(b) Provides for collection by the collector of taxes.

(c) Provides for payment by the affixture of a stamp.

(d) Provides that the collector of taxes shall furnish the stamps.

(e) Provides the time for affixing of the stamp.

(f) Prohibits the reuse of stamps.

(g) Is the same as the present law.

(h) Is the same as the present law.

(i) Is the enforcement provision providing for the forfeiture of liquor on which the tax has not been paid.

(j) Prohibits the counterfeiting of stamps.

Section 4 rewrites section 24 of the present law to provide that stamps shall be furnished to licensees to affix to containers of liquor upon which the tax has already been paid and which is in their possession on the effective date of this act.

Section 5 provides for the effective date of the act.

The first section of this bill is a minor amendment—not relating to stamps—which merely inserts in section 11, subsection (c) of the present law relating to wholesalers, the same provisions as to regulations by the Commissioners as are already in section 11, subsection (a), with reference to manufacturers. This omission was purely an oversight in the drafting of the original liquor bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I understand that an emergency exists, and I have no objection to the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I just entered the Chamber. Is the Senator from Utah going to explain the bill?

Mr. KING. Before the Senator came into the Chamber I had explained the purpose of the bill and also referred to its provisions. Practically, the bill under consideration, though it contains a number of amendments, has but one purpose, and that is to make more certain that taxes shall be collected upon the liquors sold within the District of Columbia. It has been discovered that the requirement that licensees shall make report of the amount of liquor sold does not meet the situation. It has been shown that liquors are brought into the District of Columbia and sold and there has been no accurate and satisfactory way to determine whether the tax provided by law has been paid upon the same. The Federal Government requires stamps upon the containers of liquors, and it has been found that this is a reasonably satisfactory plan to obtain the taxes provided by law. The bill before us requires, as I have heretofore stated, that stamps showing that the tax has been paid be placed on all containers. In other words, before alcoholic liquors can be sold, stamps must be obtained from the District authorities and placed upon all vessels, kegs, bottles, and so forth, in which the alcoholic beverages provided by law are contained.

Mr. BORAH. This is the only amendment of the act?

Mr. KING. As stated, the various amendments offered deal with the purchase of stamps and the placing of them upon all receptacles and containers. There is also a minor amendment which relates to regulations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 11, subsection (c), of the District of Columbia Alcoholic Beverage Control Act is amended by adding at the end of the first paragraph thereof the following: "It shall not authorize the sale of beverages to any other person except as may be provided by regulations promulgated by the Commissioners under this act."

SEC. 2. That section 22 of the said Alcoholic Beverage Control Act be amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph to read as follows:

"(c) The Commissioners may at any time suspend or revoke in whole or in part the requirements of this section."

SEC. 3. That section 23 of the said Alcohol Beverage Control Act is amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 23. (a) There shall be levied, collected, and paid on all of the following-named beverages manufactured by a holder of a manufacturer's license, and on all of the said beverages imported or brought into the District of Columbia by a holder of a wholesaler's or retailer's license, a tax at the following rates, to be paid by the licensee in the manner hereinafter provided:

"(1) A tax of 35 cents on every wine-gallon of wine containing more than 14 percent of alcohol by volume, except champagne, or any wine artificially carbonated and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such gallon; (2) a tax of 50 cents on every wine-gallon of champagne or any wine artificially carbonated, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such gallon; (3) a tax of 50 cents on every wine-gallon of spirits, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such gallon; (4) and a tax of $1.10 on every wine-gallon of alcohol, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such gallon.

"(b) Said taxes shall be collected by and paid to the Collector of Taxes of the District of Columbia and shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia.

"(c) Said taxes shall be collected and paid by the affixture of a stamp or stamps secured from the Collector of Taxes of the District of Columbia denoting the payment of the amount of the tax imposed by this act upon such beverage, such affixture to be upon the immediate container of the beverage, unless the Commissioners shall by regulation permit otherwise.

"(d) The collector of taxes of the District of Columbia shall furnish suitable stamps, to be prescribed by the Commissioners, denoting the payment of the taxes imposed by this act, and shall by the sale of such stamps at the amounts indicated on the faces thereof cause the said taxes to be collected.

"(e) Upon beverages manufactured in the District of Columbia by a manufacturer licensed under this act, the stamps required by this act shall be affixed before the removal of the beverage from the place of business or warehouse of the said manufacturer for delivery to a purchaser. Upon beverages except taxable light wines, imported or brought into the District of Columbia by any wholesaler licensed under this act, the stamps required by this act shall be affixed before the removal of the beverage from the place of business or warehouse of the said wholesaler for delivery to a purchaser; upon taxable light wines imported or brought into the District of Columbia by any wholesaler licensed under this act, the said stamps shall be affixed within 24 hours (excluding Sunday from the count) after the wines are received at the licensed premises of the wholesaler and before said wines are sold by such wholesaler. Upon beverages purchased outside the District of Columbia by any retailer licensed under this act, the stamps required by this act shall be affixed within 24 hours (excluding Sunday from the count) after the beverage is received at the licensed premises of said retailer and before said beverage is sold by such retailer.

"(f) No person shall use or cause to be used for the payment of any tax imposed by this act a stamp or stamps already theretofore used for the payment of any such tax.

"(g) No tax shall be levied and collected on any alcohol exempt from tax under the laws of the United States, or on any alcohol sold for nonbeverage purposes by the holder of a manufacturer's or wholesaler's license, in accordance with the regulations promulgated by the Commissioners.

"(h) If any act of Congress shall hereafter prescribe for a Federal volume tax on alcoholic beverages under which a portion of said tax shall be returned to the District of Columbia, the taxes levied under this section shall not be collected after the effective date of said act.

"(i) The possession by any licensee of any beverage after its removal from the licensed premises of a manufacturer or wholesaler within the District of Columbia or after 24 hours (Sunday being excluded from the count) after its receipt from outside the District of Columbia, upon which the tax required has not been paid, shall render such beverage liable to seizure wherever found, and to forfeiture by the District of Columbia. And the absence of the proper stamps from any container (or wrapper if such be permitted) after the time at which the affixture of the stamp is required by this act shall be notice to all persons that the tax has not been paid thereon and shall be prima facie evidence of the nonpayment thereof. Such beverage so liable to forfeiture shall be proceeded against in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia by the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia, and, if condemned, the said beverage shall be disposed of by destruction or delivered for medicinal, mechanical, or scientific uses to any department or agency of the United States Government or the District of Columbia government or any hospital or other charitable institution in the District of Columbia, or sold at public auction, as the court may direct. The proceedings of such libel cases shall conform, as near as may be, to the proceedings in admiralty, and all such proceedings shall be at the suit of and in the name of the District of Columbia.

"(j) Any person who shall counterfeit or forge any stamp required by this act shall, upon conviction, be subject to a fine not exceeding $5,000 or to imprisonment for a period of not more than 2 years, or to both such fine and imprisonment."

SEC. 4. That section 24 of said Alcoholic Beverage Control Act is amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 24. (a) Every licensed manufacturer, wholesaler, and retailer under this act shall furnish the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia on the day this act becomes effective a statement under oath, on a form to be prescribed by the Commissioners, showing the amount and kind of taxable beverages held and possessed by him on the day this act becomes effective, and shall state the number and denomination of stamps necessary for the stamping of such beverages so held and possessed on said date, as required by this act.

"(b) All beverages held or possessed by any licensed manufacturer, wholesaler, and retailer under this act on the effective date of this act shall have the stamps affixed thereto as required by this act, but such stamps shall be furnished free and without cost to such licensee by the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia upon receipt by him of the statement under oath required by paragraph (a) of this section: Provided, however, That such licensee shall on or before the 10th day of the calendar month first occurring after the effective date of this act, file with the board the statement under oath required under section 22, paragraphs (a) and (b) of the Alcoholic Beverage Control Act for the District of Columbia as originally enacted and approved, and shall on or before the 15th day of the calendar month first occurring after the effective date of this act pay to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia all taxes imposed by section 23 of said act, as originally enacted and approved, on the beverages so reported as herein required."

SEC. 5. This act shall become effective on the 1st day of the calendar month first occurring after 30 days from the approval thereof.

PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION LOANS TO THE DISTRICT

Mr. KING. Mr. President, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, I report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (S. 3404) authorizing loans from the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works for the construction of certain municipal buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 841) thereon.

This being in the nature of an emergency measure, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside and that the bill may be considered.

Briefly, the measure has the approval of the National Park and Planning Commission and of the District Commissioners. The House and Senate Committees on the District of Columbia held a joint session for the consideration of the bill, at which a number of witnesses were heard, including the District Commissioners, corporation counsel, representatives of the National Park and Planning Commission, and representatives of citizens' associations. The Senate Committees also considered the bill and have agreed upon the same, with certain amendments, and request its passage.

The purpose of the bill is to permit the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to take advantage of the provisions of the act relating to the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works. Under existing law the Commissioners have no power to borrow money. This bill gives them such authority to the extent of $20,000,000, to be obtained from the Public Works Administration under the same conditions as other municipalities are obtaining such funds. The money thus obtained is to be used almost entirely in building and construction projects, thus providing employment for many unemployed. The projects contemplated are a tuberculosis hospital, a sewage-disposal plant, the first unit of a municipal center to house the juvenile, municipal, and police courts, an addition to Gallinger Municipal Hospital, a jail or other enclosure for prisoners at Lorton, certain public schools, and for parks, parkways, and playgrounds. The committee is of the opinion that these are much-needed improvements in the District.

Since the detailed plans of each project must be investigated and approved by the Public Works Administration and the various costs checked and approved before the money can be advanced, it is not feasible to state the precise cost of each project before such action. It is hoped that these projects will be completed at sums sufficiently less than the estimates to permit the use of approximately $1,000,000 for the development of some of the land which has been acquired by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, so that it will be presently available for use as parks and playgrounds.

The bill further provides that $2,000,000 of the total authorized shall be transferred to the National Capital Park and Planning Commission for use in the acquisition of lands under the Capper-Cramton Act. Of the $16,000,000 originally authorized to be appropriated for the purposes of that Commission, $4,000,000 has been appropriated and expended, and the $2,000,000 here provided will apply on the balance of that authorized appropriation.

The total amount for which the District of Columbia will be indebted to the United States under both this act and under the authorization of the Capper-Cramton Act will be about $24,000,000 (assuming that Congress at some time appropriates the full balance authorized under the Capper-Cramton Act). This bill provides that this total shall be repaid at the rate of not less than $1,000,000 if there is no outstanding obligation on the part of the District under the Capper-Cramton Act, and not less than $1,300,000 if there is a combined obligation under the two acts outstanding. It also provides that the total requirements of the two acts for repayment in any one year shall not exceed $1,300,000, but that the Commissioners of the District may in their discretion repay any greater amount that the financial condition of the District may permit. This provision will require that the entire obligation of $24,000,000 to the United States be repaid in not less than 19 years. This would seem to be sound financing, and to require the liquidation in less than that period of a major debt of this sort, expended for public improvements of this nature, might not be entirely reasonable. The Commissioners contend that the finances of the District should not be compelled to meet a larger payment.

The bill also provides that in making payments on their account with the United States the Commissioners may exercise their own discretion in allocating their payments as between the amounts due under this act and those due under the Capper-Cramton Act. The purpose and effect of this provision is to enable the District Commissioners to handle this financing upon the most economical basis in the interest of the District.

The act in no way lessens the authorization of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission under the Capper-Cramton Act, nor does it impinge upon the authority of that Commission.

I renew my request for unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, and that Senate bill 3404 may be considered at this time. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was, on page 1, line 9, after the word "for", to strike out "the purposes of"; on page 2, line 2, after the word "sewage", to strike out "and refuse"; and on the same page, line 9, before the word "and", to insert "parks, parkways, and playgrounds (to be acquired and improved in accordance with existing law, said improvement to be on lands acquired by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission)", so as to make the section read:

That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to borrow for the District of Columbia from the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, created by the National Industrial Recovery Act, and said Administration is authorized to lend to said Commissioners, the sum of $20,000,000, or any part thereof, out of funds heretofore authorized by law for said Administration, for the acquisition, purchase, construction, establishment, and development of a tuberculosis hospital, a sewage-disposal plant, a municipal center or any unit thereof (under and in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the establishment of a municipal center in the District of Columbia", approved Feb. 28, 1929 (45 Stat. 1408)), an extension of or addition to Gallinger Municipal Hospital, a jail or other enclosure for prisoners at Lorton, Va., parks, parkways, and playgrounds (to be acquired and improved in accordance with existing law, said improvement to be on lands acquired by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission), and public schools, or any one or more of said projects as the said Commissioners may determine.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 13, before the word "transfer", to strike out "may in their discretion" and insert "shall"; in line 15, before the words "to be", to strike out "or any part thereof"; in line 16, after the word "the", to strike out "purchase" and insert "acquisition"; and in line 22, after the figures "$2,000,000", to strike out "if so transferred, or such part thereof as may be transferred to the said Commission", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That from the sum authorized to be borrowed by section 1 of this act the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall transfer to the National Capital Park and Planning Commission the sum of $2,000,000, to be available to said Commission for the acquisition of land for parks, parkways, and playgrounds in the District of Columbia in accordance with the terms of section 4 of Public Act No. 284, Seventy-first Congress, entitled "An act for the acquisition, establishment, and development of the George Washington Memorial Parkway, and so forth", approved May 29, 1930: Provided, That said sum of $2,000,000 shall be deemed to be in lieu of the appropriation of an equal amount of the sums authorized to be appropriated by the aforesaid section of the aforesaid act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 12, after the word "services", to insert "without reference to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and section 3709 of the Revised Statutes", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. The sum authorized by section 1 hereof, or any part thereof (except such sums as may be transferred by them as provided in section 2), shall, when borrowed, be available to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the acquisition by dedication, purchase, or condemnation of the fee simple title to land, or rights or easements in land, for the public uses authorized by this act, and for the preparation of plans, designs, estimates, models, and contracts, for architectural and other necessary professional services without reference to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, for the construction of buildings, including materials and labor, heating, lighting, elevators, plumbing, landscaping, and all other appurtenances, and the purchase and installation of machinery, apparatus, and any and all other expenditures necessary for or incident to the complete construction of the aforesaid buildings and plants. All contracts, agreements, and proceedings in court for condemnation or otherwise, pursuant to this act shall be had and made in accordance with existing provisions of law, except as otherwise herein provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 4, after the word "been", to strike out "borrowed" and insert "advanced to said District"; in line 7, before the word "and", to strike out "borrowing" and insert "advances"; and in line 8, after the word "thereafter", to insert "on annual balances as of each June 30", so as to read:

SEC. 4. That 70 percent of so much of said sum authorized by section 1 of this act as may be expended as therein provided shall be reimbursed to the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works from any funds in the Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia, as follows, to wit: Not less than $1,000,000 on the 30th day of June each year after such sum shall have been advanced to said District until the full amount expended hereunder is reimbursed, without interest for the first 3 years after any such advances and with interest at not exceeding 4 percent per year thereafter on annual balances as of each June 30.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 16, after the word "less" to strike out "than $1,000,000"; in line 17, after the word "than", to strike out "$1,250,000" and insert "$1,300,000", so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That whenever the District of Columbia is under obligation by virtue of the provisions of section 4 of Public Act No. 284, Seventy-first Congress, entitled "An act for the acquisition, establishment, and development of the George Washington Memorial Parkway, etc.", approved May 29, 1930, to reimburse the United States for sums appropriated by the Congress under that act, the total reimbursement required under both that act and this act shall be not less nor more than $1,300,000 in any one fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 19, after the word "said", to strike out "amounts" and insert "amount", so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the Commissioners may, in their discretion, repay more than said amount:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 24, after the word "act", to strike out the period and insert a colon and the following additional proviso:

Provided, That such sums as may be necessary for the reimbursement herein required of or permitted by the District of Columbia, and for the payment of interest, shall be included in the annual estimates of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the first reimbursement to be made on June 30, 1936.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 2, after the word "submit", to strike out "quarterly" and insert "with their annual estimates", and in line 3, after the name "House of Representatives", to strike out "(or to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, if those bodies are not in session)", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall submit with their annual estimates to the Senate and the House of Representatives a report of their activities and expenditures under section 1 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to express my thanks to the Senate for its courtesy in permitting me to take up and dispose of the two measures which have just been passed.

THE AIR MAIL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3170) to revise air-mail laws.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon for a limited time I had the opportunity of addressing myself to the Senate with reference to the bill now pending and the general subject matter thereof.

I doubt very much if the Congress of the United States will have before it during this session a more important measure, one with greater constructive possibilities, or one that will look further into the future than the pending proposed legislation.

Whatever may have been the history of the past, like all histories of the past, it constitutes a foundation on which the future must be builded. That history may have had its chapters that were not written in brilliant letters, and it may have had its chapters that were written indelibly into something that means much for the centuries yet to come. Never in all the history of mankind, however, has there been a science that meant more than the science of travel by the air, than the science of commerce by the air, because that science leads to a multitude of possibilities concerning which the imagination of man may never exhaust itself.

I desire to say now that within the past few months there has been predicted by those who should know and who do know, and who do not deal in imagination alone, something which ordinarily would startle mankind. It is predicted that the day is not far distant when one may leave the Capitol Grounds of the Capital of this Nation in the latter part of the week, rise in 8 minutes to the stratosphere, travel to the lion-hunting grounds of South Africa, and return with the trophies of his hunt to present on the following Monday at noon.

Just above our atmosphere is something that gives rise to that which led Jules Verne, the author of Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea, into the realm of an imaginative fancy which you and I laughed about when we were boys. In this proposed legislation we are not dealing with trifles; we are not dealing with mere imagination. We are dealing with realities, where science has bent its effort, and the imagination of mankind, following science and its development, has had an opportunity to know at least a little of the possibilities.

What does the bill now before this body present? Does it present a solution of that which comes now as a problem by reason of months of investigation? I say, as a member of the special investigating committee, that it does not. There is no more reason for placing the science of aviation in the hands of a political agent than there is for placing every railroad in America in such hands.

Commercial aviation should be out of the Post Office Department. It has no place there. The Post Office Department has a commodity to ship, by commercial aviation and by rail and by water; but the fact that it has a commodity to ship is no reason why it should control the avenues through which that commodity should be shipped, any more than a private individual, a great shipper, should control the avenues by which his commodity should be transferred from one State to another.

I intend to propose an amendment, and it is now before this body in printed form, which takes this entire matter out of the realm in which it now finds itself, and, finding itself there, looks back to a history that brought it into that realm. That history, so far as my present purposes go, began with what is known now as the "McNary-Watres Act", undoubtedly enacted at a time and an hour when everyone believed that the Post Office Department was the proper place for the legislation to rest itself. No one will criticize the seriousness or sincerity of those who worked out the McNary-Watres Act.

The history of that legislation will not lend itself to anything save and except a serious desire on the part of those who were studying out that line of legislation to bring about the best result for the country; but we have had the experience of that legislation, and we have found its flaws; we have found its fallacies; we have found its loopholes. Shall we go on with that? Shall we place this industry back in the control of the Postmaster General; and if so, why?

Let us consider a little history aside from the record, as well as that found in the record. For some time past—I do not know why—the office of the Postmaster General has been the office through which public patronage seems to have been dealt out under different administrations. It is as true today as it was in the past administration. It was as true then as it is now. Why should we say that a great governmental agency having in its control one of the most vital things to national life—namely, the distribution and carriage of the mail—and which, by an unwritten law, seems to have inherited the distribution of political patronage, should also control, by legislation enacted by Congress, the carrying of the mail by air, when, as a matter of fact, the navigation of the air, and the method of carrying the mail in that wise, is a new science only in its making, the ultimate possibility of which no man knows? Why should we adopt the method heretofore followed, when all that we can say of the result of past legislation is that we have brought a cloud upon a former Postmaster General, and brought the present administration in its first dilemma, by reason of that very agency?

As a Democrat, I wish to God that Postmaster General Farley had never had control over the air mail, because it has presented the first opportunity or avenue for criticism on the part of those who would criticize the present administration. If I were a Republican, I would say that I only wish my administration, when it was in power, had never had this air-mail avenue by which the opposition could drive shafts into an advancement over which I had no control.

Yet the bill now pending, introduced by the Chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, proposes to put that control right back where it was, although we are on the threshold of an advancing science, a science that is only in its infant stage, a science vital to this Government and this country in the years to come.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator's amendment of which he speaks is in the nature of a substitute?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes, sir. I shall deal with my proposed substitute further. I am going now to deal with this subject from another angle, which presents itself to the Senate by reason of many expressions that have been made. Some of them, I am sorry to say, come from the learned Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who has criticized in rather intemperate language the experience we have had in carrying the mail through the agency of the Army. If there is one thing the American people have learned during the past few months, it is that the arm of aviation, which nations have sought to build for their own defense, which we have tried to build by the expenditure of millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money, has not been developed to the point where it should stand without betterment.

Suppose war had been declared on the 9th day of February; suppose on that day our armed forces had been called upon to bring their air forces into service; where would we have been? Has it not been brought to the attention of the American people—and I regret it more than anyone else—that that great adjunct which belongs to our armed forces for defense in the future is indeed sadly lacking? If no other lesson comes out of this whole situation, we shall at least have learned that we must give more attention, from a national standpoint, to the science of defense through the air, because the air is going to be one of the great avenues of the national defense in the years to come. From that standpoint we are dealing with a science.

More than that, commerce will take its place in the air as well as on the land and on the sea. It will take its place in the air as the science develops. Are we going to destroy the thing which will make us a great commercial nation? Are we going to impede the progress of a science that is progressing day by day? Are we going to say that a science which is developing and which is essential for our national growth shall be in the control of one man, and that man a politician? I say that much as a Democrat; Senators on the other side may say it as Republicans; but regardless of the line which divides us, the Nation is bigger than this side or the other side, and a thousand times bigger than both sides. The national future means more to you and to me than our division by party lines. The man who controls patronage today has no more right to control this great science than the man who controlled patronage during the Hoover Administration had a right to control it. He made his mistakes, we have made ours, perchance. Let us take the air mail bodily, wholly, completely out of that control and put it under the jurisdiction of an independent, nonpartisan commission.

Where would we have been today if it had not been for the Interstate Commerce Commission? Have they not helped at least to solve many of our problems? Have they not given diligence and toil and energy and foresight to the development of commerce? I do not think anyone will deny that to be so. The answer comes, however, and comes from my learned colleague, the chairman of the special committee, that this avenue of commerce should be placed under the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to that suggestion I desire now to address myself.

I said there would be commerce by water, commerce by air, and commerce by rail. It will be remembered that during this masterful discourse on yesterday and the previous day, the Senator from Alabama made reference to the fact that the railroads of this country—I do not quote him; I take the substance only of his statement—were apparently looking to a control of the air lines of the country. I think the learned Senator from Alabama will agree with me that the record which he has, and which I have seen, bears out that suggestion. Are we now going to place in the hands of a competitor the control of a natural scientific agency which is only in its making? Are we going to place this whole science, this whole development, in the hands and control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, when, as a matter of fact, we have not as yet, save by legislation now pending here, which has not as yet been passed, sought to give control of international water rates through the Canal to the Interstate Commerce Commission? Not as yet have we seen fit to give control of intercoastal water rates through the Canal to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Many of us have fought for that, and will continue to fight for it, because we think it will develop and build up our railroad industry and give opportunity to laborers who toil on the railroads of this country.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I hope we will be considering shortly the question of giving the pipe lines over to the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator from Idaho makes a suggestion in which, perhaps, there is much merit. I regret exceedingly that I have not sufficient knowledge to accede to or to contradict his position. Undoubtedly his diligent study and his long experience here have brought him to that frame of mind. My admiration for him naturally leads me to say that there must be something in the suggestion, or he would not make it.

But what have we before the Senate of the United States today? A reiteration, a repetition, of that which was portrayed for 2 days here by one of the masters of logic, the chairman of the special committee. He proposes, by adding his name to the now pending bill, to bring back into the hodge-podge of the Post Office Department the control of this great science and this great avenue of commerce. When I queried him yesterday, he said, "Yes; your mind and mine run along the same line, but I want to put it in the Interstate Commerce Commission." I should like to know why.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I assume the Senator is asking me the question. I do not want to interrupt him, if he does not desire to yield at this time.

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I will state to the Senator very frankly the reason why I think the control should be placed in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The bill to which my name is signed would take the air mail away from the Post Office Department and place it in the Interstate Commerce Commission. We have already given notice that an amendment will be offered cutting down the length of time within which that is to be done. The amendment will provide that a study shall be begun within 6 months and that, upon the expiration of the then-existing contracts, the rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission for carrying the mail shall be adopted. I wanted to state this to the Senator so that he would understand the nature of the amendment of which we have given notice.

I will say to the Senator further that I prefer to have the control in the Interstate Commerce Commission because I am opposed to the creation of a new bureau for that purpose at the present time. Frankly, I should like to see the Interstate Commerce Commission have control of all transportation in the country, perhaps with a division in the Commission, but the reason why I favor giving the air-mail control to the Interstate Commerce Commission is that I believe it could better handle the subject.

I thoroughly subscribe to the Senator's idea, as he understands, that we should take it out of the Post Office Department, and I shall be very glad indeed if the bill shall be amended as we suggest, so that upon the expiration of the contracts which have been made the Interstate Commerce Commission may take charge and fix the rates.

The Senator and I have discussed the matter many times, and I have no controversy whatever with him as to taking control away from the Post Office Department. I do not believe, however, we should create a new commission for the purpose, I think that is the essential difference between the idea of the Senator and my idea.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I am grateful to my colleague on the special committee. I have never yet found him when he was not candid. I love his blunt, resolute, determined candor. That is the kind of stuff I like to deal with, and the Senator is the kind of man with whom I love to be associated. Now I wish to compare his ideas and mine.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, if I may use a homely expression—and I hope I do not use it to the point of exaggeration—by reason of long study is rail-minded. We are on the threshold of a new science, a new science into which new blood must be brought, into which new thoughts must be brought, and in which independent efforts must be put forth. The rule, the law, the code, which apply today may be antiquated tomorrow, because only yesterday men went 11 miles above the earth and tomorrow they may be going twice 11. I say it should be under a commission, independent, free, clear of the old thoughts and the old ideas, because aviation cannot be built up save and except upon a prospectus founded upon the glories of imagination.

Our aviation experience up to date has developed that, after men pass a certain period in life, after they have passed middle age, for some reason or other, the majority—though not all—lose the keener senses of imagination; and it is said that a pilot beyond the meridian of life is not always to be trusted, because for some reason or other he has been deprived of that beauty of imagination and, perchance, I might put it, that courage which says, "There is no limit to what I can do." So we are dealing with something new and something young and something beautiful. Let us erect a new commission to take hold of it.

The Senator from Alabama does not need to fear the creation of a new commission. Continuous contact for months in this study has brought the Senator from Alabama and me very closely together, mentally and otherwise. The Senator from Alabama knows as well as I know that since the 4th of March 1933, by legislative enactment we have been creating more and more new commissions. So we do not have to fear another new one created to take hold of a great and new science and a great and new avenue of national commerce. A little something more new will not hurt us, because we are in the midst of the new, and I am grateful for it. We have had a new deal. I hope it will succeed. My efforts will be bent toward accomplishing its success, and that is the reason why I am now bending my efforts in the present direction. The learned Senator from Alabama, however, in his very courteous reply, for which I am grateful, says that he and other Senators propose an amendment whereby there will be created a commission to make a study and investigation of this matter. That is exactly what my amendment, which will be offered as a substitute for the bill under consideration, proposes; but it proposes a basic investigation so that the commission shall continue on and on, and so that out of its investigations it shall build for the future.

The Senator from Alabama, representing the authors of the pending bill, now says that he proposes a commission to make a study, that that shall proceed for a year, and then that a report shall be made to the Interstate Commerce Commission, I presume. If a study is worth while, why do we not from the first give the proposed commission the benefit of its own study, so that it may look into the future and say, "This is our course. We are inspired with a national responsibility, and we will carry it out to the best of our ability under our oath and our obligation"?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will my colleague on the committee yield in order that I may explain the idea and conception I have?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Of course, I realize that I may be entirely wrong, and I highly respect the views of my colleague on the committee; but it is my belief that we shall correct several abuses by the bill which we have offered, abuses with which he and I have become familiar during the past year. We have limited salaries. We have provided for a dissociation or divorcement of the operating companies from their associated holding companies and subsidiaries. The idea of a commission is to study the general, broad subject of military and naval aviation and manufactures, so that a broad aviation policy may be developed. In this bill it has been my conception that we were simply taking up the air-mail feature of the policy which, to my great gratification, is to be turned over to the Interstate Commerce Commisison within a very short time, if the bill shall pass.

I simply desire to state to my colleague my conception of the object of the commission.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I am again pleased. My colleague on the special committee cannot offend me by interruption, because every time he interrupts he gives me new impetus for my idea. I believe, as he believes, that aviation is a science which should be developed. I believe, as he believes, that commerce, through this science, should have an individual organization for its study and for its development. I go further, because I believe that that organization for the study and development of this science and this line of commerce should be free from all other entanglements or considerations. I think—I hope I may be right—the learned Senator from Alabama would agree with me that, if this duty should be devolved upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, it would mean the creation of a separate and distinct bureau within that Commission.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to address an inquiry to the Senator from Nevada.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair). The time of the Senator from Nevada on the amendment has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the time occupied in connection with my inquiry may be taken from my time.

Mr. McCARRAN. I understand, Mr. President, that I have 30 minutes on the bill and 30 minutes on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. McCARRAN. My understanding is that it is not one amendment; that it is an amendment to one after another of the sections. I do not understand it to be one amendment offered as a substitute. If I am in error, I should like to be corrected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment, in the form in which it was offered, is one amendment. The Chair will now recognize the Senator from Nevada for 30 minutes on the bill if he wishes. The time of the Senator on his amendment has expired; and the Chair will now recognize him for 30 minutes on the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will that be sufficient time for the Senator from Nevada to present and conclude his argument?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I shall try to cover what I have to say in that time.

Mr. WALSH. I shall be glad to ask unanimous consent for an extension of time in behalf of the Senator from Nevada if his time is not sufficient.

Mr. McCARRAN. I shall be glad to have the Senator from Massachusetts do so. I think the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] also will make such a request.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, it is my idea that anyone offering a substitute for the bill should have ample time to discuss it; and if the Senator from Nevada shall not have completed his statement at the expiration of his remaining 30 minutes I will ask, if there be no objection, that he be given additional time for the further presentation of the subject.

Mr. WALSH. That is the proper thing to do.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHITE. There is pending an amendment in the nature of a substitute reported by the committee, upon which, I take it, the Senator from Nevada would have 30 minutes. There is also pending an amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada himself. There is likewise pending an amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] and myself, and another amendment is pending, offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. My inquiry is, Would not the Senator from Nevada have 30 minutes on each of those amendments if he should so desire?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that he would not have. There is only one pending amendment. The others are in abeyance, awaiting the disposition of the Senate.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. FESS. The Presiding Officer's statement is correct; but if the Senator from Nevada should offer some other amendment, he would have 30 minutes on that also, would he not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He would have when that amendment was reached.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What request does the Senator from Alabama make?

Mr. BLACK. I do not make any request now, Mr. President. The Senator from Nevada has 30 minutes on the bill. I simply gave notice that in the case of any Senator's offering a substitute for the bill which he desires fully to present, if he shall not have finished at the expiration of his time, I will ask unanimous consent that he may have time to present the substitute. I think that would be fair.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Am I to understand that the Senator from Nevada is stressing as the main feature of his proposed substitute the establishment of a commission that will investigate the scientific aspects of the subject of aviation from the standpoint of mail transportation?

Mr. McCARRAN. Not alone from the standpoint of mail transportation but from the standpoint of commerce generally, and the carrying of passengers and express, mail being included.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the Senator agrees that there has already been an investigation of certain aspects of air-mail transportation. Is that correct?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH. What limitations were put upon that investigation? Was it confined merely to the abuses in connection with the contracts and violations of the contracts which were entered into with the Post Office Department?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes, sir; our investigation went largely into that feature.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator's proposal is for the creation of a commission that will study the whole subject of aviation?

Mr. McCARRAN. To study the subject and the facts connected therewith.

Mr. WALSH. But what does his substitute do in the way of making provision for carrying mail during the period from now on?

Mr. McCARRAN. I will deal with that in just a moment, and think I will furnish a complete answer to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. And there are provisions in his proposed substitute dealing with that subject.

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. Do they differ from the provisions of the bill presented by the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. McCARRAN. They differ very much.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Alabama leaves the authority to make these contracts where it is now, namely, in the Post Office Department?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes; to a large extent that is so.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I am trying to get the basic differences between the two proposals.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will yield——

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The proposal offered by me and the Senator from Tennessee originally left with the Post Office authorities for the period of 3 years the right to let contracts on competitive bids. We gave notice that an amendment would be offered, and it will be offered, which will provide that within 6 months after the enactment of the bill the Interstate Commerce Commission shall fix the air-mail rates; that thereafter the rates shall be fixed by that Commission, and it shall also decide upon certificates of convenience and necessity. So we do not leave it with the Post Office Department. I have favored taking the power out of the hands of the Post Office Department as soon as possible.

Mr. WALSH. Who is to make the contracts?

Mr. BLACK. The Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. WALSH. But under the bill of the Senator from Nevada he proposes a distinct aviation commission similar to the Interstate Commerce Commission, as I understand?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. BLACK. But limiting it to aviation, so that our bill would leave it in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission, while the Senator from Nevada would create an aviation commission, believing that to be better than turning it over to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. WALSH. And the aviation commission would have authority to fix rates as well as to make the study that is proposed of the whole problem of aviation?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLACK. We will have in our bill a provision for a survey and study, but the proposed substitute of the Senator from Nevada provides for a commission, as I understand, with authority over aviation similar to the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission over the railroads.

Mr. WALSH. Has any committee considered the bill of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. McCARRAN. No; I worked this bill out by myself, and I undertake to assume the responsibility for it.

Mr. WALSH. It is unfortunate that the Senator did not have an opportunity to get the support of another champion for his bill, as he undoubtedly would if it had been sent to a committee.

Mr. McCARRAN. It has been sent to the committee as an individual bill and is now pending before the Commerce Committee.

Mr. WALSH. Has there been any report on it?

Mr. McCARRAN. The committee have had one hearing, at which I appeared, but no report has come out of that committee, in view of the fact that the pending bill was brought forward. It was entirely for that reason that I presented it as an amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Otherwise they could argue that the subject had been disposed of?

Mr. McCARRAN. In order that I may further answer and elucidate, if I can, the pertinent and intelligent questions propounded to me by the Senator from Massachusetts, I want to say that the bill that I will offer as an amendment proposes to create an individual, independent, nonpartisan commission to deal with the science of aviation and the transportation by air of passengers, freight, and express. This bill proposes to do away with competitive bidding as regards the carrying of the mails, because I do not believe that any good has ever ultimately come out of competitive bidding that could not have been accomplished by another method. I think the investigation that has been conducted here, and other investigations, have disclosed the cogency of my statement.

The bill that I will propose as a substitute for the pending measure takes the entire matter out of the hands of the Post Office Department and puts it into the hands of a commission, which commission may, after investigation, issue certificates of convenience and necessity. It further provides that all lines which were in operation flying over a distance of 250 miles 6 months prior to the 1st of January 1934 shall have a certificate of convenience and necessity; all lines applying for a certificate of convenience and necessity shall present their application to the separate commission which will be created; that notices shall be given; that an investigation shall be made as to whether or not a certificate should be issued; and that, after such investigation, the commission may or may not issue such a certificate.

What are the aims of a method of that kind? I want to deal with something of recent history, something that has taken place within the past 10 days. If one will investigate the bids that have been made for the carrying of the mails in the past 10 days, he will find that there are some who have entered bids—and I believe their bids will be honored—that have not the equipment to carry the mail. That is a matter that should be in the hands not of the Post Office Department but in the hands of a commission capable of saying whether or not public necessity demanded it, and certainly whether or not the bidder had the equipment to carry the mail and to conduct commerce by its planes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. So, I understand the Senator's proposal is that the commission to be created shall examine the applicant before issuing a permit or certificate to transport passengers or to carry freight or mail? Then the commission shall, after examination, issue certificates of fitness and convenience and necessity, Should I understand the next step to be that only those who have been given such certificates may carry the mail?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes; or may transport commerce from State to State.

Mr. WALSH. How is the Senator going to arrive at the next step, which is permitting some of them to carry the mail and others not to carry the mail? How is that to be worked out?

Mr. McCARRAN. On the same basis on which the railroads carry the mail today. In other words, the railroads are not operating under contract; they have certificates of convenience and necessity, and every railroad must carry the mail.

Mr. WALSH. Are the rates uniform?

Mr. McCARRAN. The rates are uniform.

Mr. WALSH. Based upon mileage?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes; based upon mileage.

Mr. WALSH. And weight and tonnage?

Mr. McCARRAN. Weight and tonnage and space.

Mr. WALSH. And the Senator proposes that the commission to be created shall apply the same standards, the same system, in permitting duly authorized companies to transport passengers or freight as are applied in the case of the railroads?

Mr. McCARRAN. Where they have a certificate of convenience, they will carry the mail on a rate schedule or a schedule set up that will be uniform, with certain differences and equations entering into consideration.

Mr. WALSH. For my information, I should like to ask the Senator another question. Under the existing contracts is there a decided variation in the rates paid for transporting the mail by airplane? Is the pay based on a uniform mileage system or does one company get a rate different from that of another company?

Mr. McCARRAN. I will answer the question as regards the contracts that were canceled. There was a decided difference, and sometimes the highest bidder obtained a contract and the lower bidder was lost sight of.

Mr. WALSH. In other words, there is no standard measurement by which these contracts would be given to the lowest bidder?

Mr. McCARRAN. There was none that was in force.

Mr. WALSH. And there was no uniform regulation as to the amount of tonnage or the mileage in the carrying of the mails?

Mr. McCARRAN. No; there were certain provisions in the law and certain provisions in the regulations as to that.

Mr. WALSH. Was the contention made that certain routes were more dangerous than others and that, therefore, a higher rate ought to be given?

Mr. McCARRAN. No; that element was not considered at all.

Mr. WALSH. So that when two contracts were alike they had no particular standard of measure for payment for this kind of service?

Mr. McCARRAN. To a large extent, that is correct.

Mr. WALSH. And that system would continue unless the Interstate Commerce Commission should adopt a uniform plan or system, such as the Senator proposes in his bill?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is true.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I will say that is exactly the plan that is contemplated in our bill, the same plan as the Senator from Nevada has suggested under the commission which he proposes.

Mr. WALSH. So that in the determination of the right to carry the mail there is practically no difference between the two bills. There is a difference in who shall administer it, namely, the Interstate Commerce Commission provided for in the bill of the Senator from Alabama and a new commission which the Senator from Nevada proposes to create. I understand the Senator from Nevada by his proposal authorizes and directs the proposed new commission to make a general survey of the whole subject of aviation?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. BLACK. If the Senator will yield, I will say that our bill provides for investigation of the entire subject, a report to be submitted to the next Congress with reference to a policy with respect to aviation in all its branches.

Mr. WALSH. As we develop this matter, apparently, there seem to be fewer and fewer differences between the two bills.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not come to that conclusion. There are enormous differences between the two bills, which I hope the Senator will understand before he votes.

Mr. WALSH. Apparently there is going to be a commission created under either bill to study the subject, and apparently the system of granting certificates of convenience and necessity is the same, and apparently the method of paying for carrying the mail is the same. Are not those the fundamental points involved?

Mr. McKELLAR. The fundamental difference is that under the McCarran substitute a commission is set up to take charge of the air-mail business, first starting out by restoring the old contracts that were in existence when the cancelations took place.

Mr. McCARRAN. Oh, Mr. President, I cannot allow that statement to go unchallenged. I will not allow it to go at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will certainly admit that he provides in his substitute that certificates of convenience and necessity are to be given to every company which carried mail on the 1st of January 1934. If that does not restore the old companies, I am unable to understand language.

Mr. WALSH. It restores the companies, but does not restore their contracts.

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. It restores to them the right to carry mail, with the right under the new commission to be paid any amount up to 50 cents.

Mr. WALSH. I shall be very glad to have the Senator from Nevada explain the differences.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Tennessee, the senior author of the bill, interrupted. I am glad he brought up the subject because I want to deal with it.

There is no contract mentioned in the substitute I shall propose, but I do not propose to tear down the energy and the money which have been put into a science during the past 20 years, and relegate both men and money to the trash heap. I do not believe every man who flew an air-mail plane was a criminal. No one can ever make me believe that. I do not propose that a service which was developed by the youth and money of this country, and which represents some of the finest things in science, shall be relegated to a trash heap to become just a lost piece of junk.

Yes, the bill provides that those who operated lines for 6 months prior to the 1st day of January 1934 shall have instanter on the passage of the bill certificates of convenience. It provides that those lines which were developed by science, and by the energy and courage of men and by the money of this country shall have an opportunity.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McCARRAN. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. I am very much interested in that statement of the Senator from Nevada. If that statement is accurate, I think it will make some difference in what I shall have to say. Will the Senator read into the RECORD that part of his substitute which compels restoration of the status quo before the cancelation? I am very much interested in that.

Mr. WALSH. Have not the companies the right now to operate?

Mr. McCARRAN. Certainly they have. It is only a question of carrying the mail.

Mr. WALSH. All the Senator's amendment provides is that they shall get a certificate of convenience and necessity, whether they are old operators or new operators.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct. I read from page 11 of the bill, line 13:

> Certificates of public convenience and necessity issued under this act shall be effective from the date specified therein, and shall continue in effect until suspended or revoked as hereinafter provided, or until their expiration, if issued for a limited time.

That is one provision, but not the one for which I was looking.

Mr. WALSH. As I read the provision, any bona-fide operator of interstate air commerce on a daily schedule of at least 250 miles shall be entitled as a matter of course to receive from the commission, immediately upon the passage of this bill, without application therefor, a certificate of convenience and necessity. Of course, that includes not only those who operated air mail but also those who operated passenger or freight lines if they had actually been in operation for the 6-month period referred to.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. As I understand the Senator's proposed substitute, it does not restore the status quo as suggested by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. McCARRAN. I did not hear the question of the Senator from Vermont sufficiently to understand it fully.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator's substitute does not restore the old contracts.

Mr. McCARRAN. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. BLACK. It simply provides that there shall be automatically issued to all companies which were operating and had been operating for 6 months prior to January 1, 1934, a certificate of convenience and necessity.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McCARRAN. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Did anything develop in the investigation of the air-mail companies that would justify the denial of a certificate of convenience and necessity?

Mr. BLACK. There has been no effort to prevent the companies from operating in any way. The air-mail contracts have been canceled. The only difference, as I understand, between our bill and the substitute of the Senator from Nevada as to that provision is that under our bill there are certain things that must be done by any company, old or new, one of which is that it must not have certain interlocking stock ownership or directorships.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator does not take for granted that any company will get a certificate, but will leave that entirely to a commission?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; if they meet the qualifications set forth in our bill and the general qualifications of the Commerce Department, which are similar to those contained in the substitute of the Senator from Nevada, with the exception, as I understand, that his substitute does not contain certain qualifications which in our bill we require, or certain disqualifications which are set forth with reference to interlocking stock ownership.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the Senator, and I shall not interrupt the Senator from Nevada further. I apologize for having taken so much of his time.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I now undertake to deal with the question propounded by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. I read from the substitute which I shall offer, page 8, as follows:

> Any carrier (or its predecessor in interest substantially all of whose assets are owned or controlled by applicant) which on January 1, 1934, and for a period of at least 6 months prior thereto, was in bona fide operation of interstate air commerce on a daily schedule of at least 250 miles * * * shall be entitled, as a matter of course, to receive from the commission immediately following the passage of this act, and without application therefor, a certificate of public convenience and necessity which shall be applicable to any route or routes operated by the carrier during the aforesaid period.

I did not fully understand the Senator's question, but as bearing on the subject of the restoration of the status quo, I will say that I do not contemplate the restoration of the status quo to include the renewal or restoration of the canceled contracts.

Mr. AUSTIN. Who is to award the contracts, and how are they to be awarded after the certificate of public convenience is obtained?

Mr. McCARRAN. There is no contract for the carrying of the mails. There is a rate schedule set up in the bill, which rate schedule the Senator will find in the substitute is only temporary until the commission shall have made a study to determine whether or not that rate schedule is just and equitable and right. That rate schedule, I want to say, grows out of a study which was presented last September by the air-mail carriers of the country to the present Postmaster General, and they offered to take the schedule when he was asking for a reduction of the service.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, when will the Postmaster General place mail on these routes—whenever and if he sees fit to do so?

Mr. McCARRAN. Whenever a route has a certificate of convenience and necessity issued by this independent commission, the Postmaster General may place the mail on the plane on that route, and that plane gets the rate provided by the bill as it carries the mail, just the same as the trains now do.

Mr. AUSTIN. And the Postmaster General may not place it there, if he chooses to do so?

Mr. McCARRAN. He may not place it on a train today if he chooses not to do so.

Mr. AUSTIN. He may not choose to place the mail on any route he has canceled heretofore.

Mr. McCARRAN. That would depend on the service. The independent commission would say whether or not the service demanded that the mail should be carried on a particular route, and would have control over the Postmaster General to that extent.

Mr. AUSTIN. That is the question I am asking. Is the Postmaster General bound by any finding of the proposed commission to place the mail on a particular route?

Mr. McCARRAN. That would be my interpretation; and I shall be glad to have an amendment that would make it mandatory, after investigation, where a necessity presented itself.

The difference between the two bills—and I think my time is nearly up—is very great. I do not care how Senators argue or what they say; the bill now pending, introduced by the Chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, places this whole matter in its initial stages in the hands of the Postmaster General. That is what I desire to avoid, and I am telling the Senate why I desire to avoid it. I am sorry that two men within our own memory came under the blight of a law dealing with a matter of which they never should have had control; and one of them is now in charge of the Post Office Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, in view of the large number of interruptions that have occurred and the fact that the Senator has hardly begun an analysis of his bill, I ask unanimous consent for an extension of his time.

Mr. WALSH. For an hour.

Mr. BLACK. How much time would the Senator like?

Mr. McCARRAN. An hour would be ample.

Mr. BLACK. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator may have an hour's additional time for the discussion of his substitute.

Mr. WALSH. I hope that request will be granted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I am sure there will be no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Would the effect of granting this extension be to open the time for response to a similar extent?

The Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] and I have an amendment pending here. In opening the debate we did not take 2 full days before the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] commenced to speak; that is, we closed a short time after 3 o'clock on the second day; and if the time is to be further extended, we feel that a similar extension should be allowed us.

Mr. WALSH. Let us have one request at a time. Let the Senator from Nevada have his extension.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then I object.

Mr. WALSH. I hope the Senator will not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Vermont that the time would have to be extended upon a separate request in every case.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. WALSH. The immediate question before the Senate is a request for unanimous consent that the Senator from Nevada have 1 hour's extension of time to discuss an amendment in the nature of a substitute bill, which he has just introduced, and which is of great importance; and much of his time has been taken up by questions.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I want the Senator to have that extension of time, but we desire to have an equal extension of time. We have been very generous indeed, and have not objected to more time being taken by the opposition than we took. All I ask is, are they willing to permit us an equal extension of time?

Mr. WALSH. Does not the Senator think he can rely upon the magnanimity of the Senate? It always grants such requests. There is no disposition here to shut off anybody who has a real argument to present. I think the request ought to be granted.

Mr. AUSTIN. Who speaks for the Senate on this question? That is what I should like to know.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, objection has been made; and, if I am recognized, I should like to offer an amendment. On page 12, line 23, I move to strike out "three" and insert "one"; and I hope we may have a vote on that, as it is a perfecting amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McKELLAR. May we have a vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada is entitled to 30 minutes on this amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in order that I may to the best of my ability answer the questions that have been propounded here—because I think each of these questions is elucidating—I desire to say that the amendment I shall offer as a substitute for the entire pending bill, one phase of which I have gone over, creates an independent commission. I shall not deal longer with that. It does away with all idea of competitive bidding for carrying the mail. It provides that the proposed independent commission shall establish a rate schedule for carrying the mail by airplane mile. It provides that on or before the 31st day of December 1934 all interlacing directorates shall be dissolved, so that a director on one line may not be a director on another.

That is something which the learned Senator from Tennessee seems to have thought was outstanding. My proposed substitute bill provides for it. It provides that one company shall not control or own the majority of the stock of another, and it shall not hold any of the stock of another company for voting privileges. It may hold it, as the Supreme Court has decided, as an investment, but for nothing else.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me before he leaves entirely the question found on page 8?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. McKELLAR. I call the Senator's attention to subsection (b) of section 6, on page 8 of his proposed substitute bill. I quote it:

(b) Any carrier (or its predecessor in interest substantially all of whose assets are owned or controlled by applicant) which on January 1, 1934, and for a period of at least 6 months prior thereto, was in bona fide operation of interstate air commerce on a daily schedule of at least 250 miles (except as to interruptions in operations over which the carrier had no control), shall be entitled, as a matter of course, to receive from the Commission immediately following the passage of this act, and without application therefor, a certificate of public convenience and necessity which shall be applicable to any route or routes operated by the carrier during the aforesaid period.

Now I call the Senator's attention to the following language of subsection (c) at the top of page 24 of his substitute:

(c) Pending the determination by the Commission of fair and reasonable rates, the rate for the transportation of mail by aircraft and the services connected therewith shall be as follows: First 50 pounds of average load per mile at 5 mills per pound; second 50 pounds of average loan per mile at 3 mills per pound; third 50 pounds of average load per mile at 1 mill per pound; and all over 150 pounds of average load per mile at one half mill per pound: Provided, however, That in no event shall a carrier receive more than 50 cents per pound-mile.

Taking those two together, I ask the Senator if, in his judgment, the effect of that language is not that the certificates of convenience and necessity will at once—or, in the words of the bill, as a matter of course—be turned over to the old companies and they immediately will have the right to carry the mail at the poundage rates stated in subsection (c) on page 24?

Mr. McCARRAN. The question answers itself out of the bill. I say, to a large extent, that is correct; in other words, that those who invested their money and put their energy into building up these lines to the point that had been reached on the 1st of January 1934 should have a right to a certificate of convenience and necessity.

Let us take section by section the question propounded.

Is there any reason why the United Air Lines, flying across the center of this continent with the finest equipment money can buy, with great, graceful ships that carry men and express from ocean to ocean, should be consigned to the trash heap? I cannot understand that particular turn of mind. I just cannot get it.

I cannot see why the Northwest Airways, with all its development; why the T.A.T., with its development—why all of this energy should be consigned to the junk heap and someone else come along and buy it up for junk and put it in service on mail-carrying lines or commerce-carrying lines. I just cannot get that idea, and I never shall. I say the steps we have made toward progress, toward development, should be continued, even though there may be those who would cast a shadow upon their initiation and development.

I think good can come out of that which may have been condemned. I realize that the Senator from Tennessee and those behind this measure would deprive anyone of carrying the mail whose mail contract had been canceled in the past.

Now, coming to page 24, to which the learned Senator from Tennessee makes reference, I invite the Senate's attention to this:

Pending the determination by the Commission—

Pending the determination by the newly created commission of fair rates for carrying the mail, the commodity which the United States Government has to carry by the speediest and safest way—

Pending the determination by the Commission of fair and reasonable rates—

Would it be said that I am awarding a contract? Not at all—the rate for the transportation of mail by aircraft and the services connected therewith shall be as follows:

Mind you, that might not be in existence more than a week, or a month, or 2 months, after the commission came into existence, but pending the operation and activity of the commission the rate shall be as follows:

First 50 pounds of average load per mile at 5 mills per pound.

That is for 50 pounds of the average load per mile. What is the average load per mile? It is the average of the load carried over a given distance for a period determined, which is 30 days. A plane might carry 10 pounds today and 100 pounds tomorrow, but the average of the two over the miles traveled for the period of 30 days would be the average load per mile.

Second 50 pounds of average load per mile at 3 mills per pound; third 50 pounds of average load per mile at 1 mill per pound; and all over 150 pounds of average load per mile at one half mill per pound.

Then follows a proviso; and I invite the attention of the learned Senator from Tennessee to the proviso, because, if my amendment shall be adopted, I propose to amend the proviso itself, for the reason that there is a provision in it which is an error. In dictating it I was responsible for a slip of the tongue and made an error, and the error will be changed. It should read:

That in no event shall a carrier receive more than 50 cents per plane-mile.

It should not be "per pound-mile." There is a difference with a distinction, if Senators understand it, and I hope I may make myself clear. Fifty cents per pound-mile might mean 50 cents per mile clear across the continent, whereas 50 cents per plane-mile means 50 cents for the carrying of all the mail which a plane carries clear across the continent. The one would be unfair; the other would be reasonable and fair. There is a proviso there which I propose to correct, if the amendment shall be adopted.

There is an incongruity in the language also which I propose to correct if the amendment shall be adopted. It has been brought to my attention that my substitute might prohibit collective bargaining; that the pilots might not have the right to organize. They seem to be in doubt about it, and they have asked me that it be clarified, and I propose to clarify it by amendment so as to make it fair and reasonable in every respect.

Mr. President, I rather like questioning. I hope that more questions may be propounded. They do not interfere at all; they give me an opportunity to develop my thought.

I am coming back to the line of demarcation between the bill offered by the learned Senator from Tennessee and my colleague on the special committee and the bill which I propose as a substitute for that bill. I am coming back to that, and I am about to close on this subject at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before the Senator closes, let me say that, in my judgment, the principal difference between the two bills is that the Senator's substitute proposes to allow the air-mail carriers to consolidate, and contains no real provision against their owning manufacturing companies, or using holding companies, or anything of the kind. Is that correct?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is not correct. The Senator has misconstrued the bill which I have offered, and I shall turn to the applicable sections.

Mr. McKELLAR. Just so that the Senator may have before him what I have in mind, let me call his attention to the provision which seems to give them authority to do those things.

Mr. McCARRAN. I will ask the Senator to turn to page 29.

Mr. McKELLAR. I read the provision:

After 90 days after this act takes effect no carrier subject to this act shall undertake the extension of its airline, or the construction of a new airline, or shall acquire through consolidation, reorganization, merger, or otherwise, or operate any airline, or extension thereof, or shall engage in interstate air commerce under this act over or by means of such additional or extended air line unless and until there shall first have been obtained from the Commission a certificate that the present or future public convenience and necessity require or will require the construction, or operation, or construction and operation, of such additional or extended airline.

The Senator will note that the language is, "After 90 days." That would give permission to these companies to consolidate as they please within 90 days. Only after 90 days after the passage of this measure would the provision to which he refers take effect.

Mr. McCARRAN. But the bill provides specifically and emphatically that there must be a complete unlacing of all directorates on or before the 31st of December 1934, and that there can be no consolidation save and except by and with the written and direct authority of the commission.

Are we to say that a commission shall not permit consolidation? Today, in the regulation of the railroads of this country, the effort is to give the Interstate Commerce Commission power, in order to bring about economic results, to permit consolidations. We have followed that course for the past few years.

I do not intend to provide that a commission, empowered as this commission will be, shall be deprived of the right to say that there might be or should be consolidations of particular lines because necessity and public convenience might demand it.

By December 31, 1934, they must have unlaced themselves, as far as directorates are concerned. They cannot hold the stock of another company for voting purposes or for control purposes. It would bring about that for which we have been crying, namely, the independence of these lines, under an independent commission, away from political influences, outside of the Post Office Department, where there has been caused so much havoc.

I propose to offer my bill as a substitute for the pending bill in its entirety. I do so after a study for nights and days and hours and weeks, during which the chairman of the special committee and others on the committee, including myself, have looked into this problem, hoping that out of our study we should be able to arrive at a solution.

I believe, in faith, that between the two contending factions—the Senator from Vermont, in his able and splendid way, contending for one thing; my colleague, the chairman of the special committee, contending for another—I may have gathered something and have written it into this bill which may go into the law of this country, not to destroy, but to build up; not to relegate this science into the past because someone has said the air-mail carriers were guilty of misconduct, but to say that out of the development they have brought about, out of the investments the public have made in these great achievements, even though the public have in many instances lost enormous sums of money, the public shall have at least a maximum of benefit from these great activities, and that those things which look to the development of this country from a commercial standpoint shall go on and on.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have been in communication with some of the officials of our labor unions today and have been supplied with some information which I wish to place in the RECORD.

I have been given figures which show that in October 1933 there were unemployed in the United States 10,122,000 people, and that there are unemployed today, some 6 months later, 10,905,000 people. That shows an increase in unemployment in this country in the last 6 months of approximately 800,000 people. All the statistics in figuring the unemployed take into account the number of people who are on the Government rolls, whether for direct or indirect relief, as being among the unemployed.

I wish to state that I am informed that this figure of 10,905,000 unemployed—an increase of 800,000 in 6 months—does not take into consideration, because there are no statistics available today, the whole number of people on the farms who, by reason of cessation of some of our agricultural activity, are more or less idle and unemployed themselves.

In the case of the ordinary man who raised a little crop for himself, and who had a little piece of land here and there, there are hardly any statistics available by which the unemployment in his line can be estimated.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator say that the statistics placed those employed under the Government operation as unemployed?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; that is, there are placed among them those who are on direct relief and indirect relief, which includes 300,000 on the P.W.A., and 253,000 on the C.C.C.

Mr. FESS. What about the 3,000,000 General Johnson says have been employed in the N.R.A.?

Mr. LONG. Oh, no; we do not count them as unemployed, if there are such. We only count those who are necessarily taken care of, who are unemployed. Does the Senator mean the 3,000,000 that the N.R.A. has taken care of?

Mr. FESS. Those are not Government employees.

Mr. LONG. The Senator will have to get General Johnson to give a little explanation. Where are they? I will come to the N.R.A.

Mr. FESS. What I have in mind is, if there are 800,000 more unemployed now than 6 months ago, and the Senator is not including the 3,000,000 employed under the operations of the N.R.A., the increased unemployment has been tremendous—more than 800,000.

Mr. LONG. The unemployment figures, as I have been given them today, show that unemployment is growing at perhaps its greatest rate right at this time. There are approximately 11,000,000 unemployed. The figure is 10,905,000. This figure of 10,905,000 cannot, because there is no available source by which the information can be had, take into account the full rural idleness and partial idleness which has been created by reason of our crop-reduction program. I know, from the standpoint of my own experience and my own undertaking to find out that percentage, that it is of considerable difficulty.

Yesterday, Mr. President, I saw a statement from the county judges of the State of Arkansas. The county judges in the State of Arkansas are the administrators of the county government. They are what might be called the business machinery of the county government of Arkansas. I have a statement, and it is a rather striking statement, which I send to the desk and ask to have read by the clerk, provided he can read as audibly and as clearly as I think I can, or better. This article appeared in the Washington Evening Star of April 26. I ask that it be read, and I ask Senators to give particular attention to the reading. The headline is, "Arkansans Protest 'Poor' United States Made by Giving Relief."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). Without objection, the article will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ARKANSANS PROTEST "POOR" UNITED STATES MADE BY GIVING RELIEF—COUNTY JUDGES TO APPEAL TO PRESIDENT TO CARE FOR NEW NEEDY

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., April 26.—Arkansas' county judges planned today to take a direct appeal to President Roosevelt for relief to care for "Government-made paupers" turned over to them when the Federal relief program ended several weeks ago.

Striking back at the charge of the county judges that the Federal Relief Administration made "paupers out of poor people" by encouraging additions to the relief rolls, State Relief Administrator W. R. Dyess charged the judges with "playing politics."

The Arkansas County Judges' Association, at a meeting here yesterday, adopted a resolution, directed to Federal Relief Administrator Harry L. Hopkins and to President Roosevelt, reciting that counties cannot shoulder the burden of caring for "Government-made paupers."

The judges, led by their president, Charles Mitchell, of Poinsett County, and by their secretary, R. M. Ruthven, of Baxter County, charged that before the Government took over relief paupers were relatively few.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, that was a rather striking statement, coming from the county judges of Arkansas. We all know that our learned leader on this side of the Chamber comes from that great State; and having some familiarity with the State, I had looked upon it as being possibly one which would indicate the trend of events. The resolution which the judges adopted is somewhat confusing. It is confusing at this stage of the game to find that with all the money which has been poured out in that State, and in other States as well—I understand there has been no particular preference for it, perhaps—the county judges should be meeting at this time and resolving to the effect that the system we were employing was doing nothing but creating a pauper mill that the Government was running.

Mr. President, Arkansas, like Louisiana, is a good Democratic State; and to have the charge come from the Democratic machinery of that great State that we are operating a pauper mill here is something which I am sure will cause us to pause and to ponder just a moment.

I have in that connection an editorial which appeared in the Philadelphia Record. I am confining myself, Mr. President, to our own Democratic service. I am not going to go afield. I am only placing in the RECORD today, pursuant to request, in some instances from colleagues on this side of the Chamber, information they have supplied me. I have a great editorial from our Democratic paper, the Philadelphia Record, of April 26, 1934. I will read a line or two myself, and I ask that the entire article may be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

I read as follows:

GIVE THE TORIES SOMETHING TO SHOUT ABOUT

President Roosevelt wants the unemployment insurance bill passed.

Congressional leaders are asked to take quick action, to include the bill on the "must" schedule.

This is the best possible news for the country—

If it means that the Tories who have been shouting "radical!" at the President are at last to be given something to shout about.

The plain truth is the Tories have been winning more Washington battles than the Liberals.

They won when the President set his face against Federal liquidation of closed-bank deposits.

They won when he recognized the company union in his settlement of the auto-strike problem.

They won when he held out against expansion of credit and the creation of a central bank.

They won when codified industries were permitted to raise prices more than wages.

They won when the President failed to support the original Wagner labor disputes bill.

They won when C.W.A. was curtailed to please Budget balancers and low-wage-paying industrialists.

He had disheartened his liberal supporters by his more than fair-minded effort to meet the reactionaries half-way.

Tories shouted anyway.

Let the President move forward with his old courage to the fundamental reforms America needs.

This article, after continuing for some few lines, then says:

The Tories will scream "blue murder." But they scream "blue murder" at anything short of Hooverism. It is impossible to please them.

Our problem is saving America, not pacifying the reactionaries.

Millions of Americans, who have no clever lawyers in Washington, no lobbies, no propaganda machines, are hoping that the unemployment insurance approval means resumption of the new deal.

I ask that the editorial from the Philadelphia Record of April 26, 1934, be printed in full at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUSSELL in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have an article which appears in the weekly newspaper Labor of date May 1, 1934. On page 4 of this paper, in a column headed "Lonergan's Comment", is a discussion of the N.R.A., in which the following appears:

"Why have you failed to prosecute big concerns which are violating N.R.A. codes?"

That question was propounded to Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, Chief of the N.R.A., at a meeting in Washington of newspaper editors from all parts of the country.

The general replied that he had been unable to secure a case against a large corporation which "would stand up in court", and he explained that surprising state of affairs by saying:

"Big concerns have the best legal pilots in the world to steer them so close to the rocks that it's hard to tell where there are violations."

IMMUNITY FOR THE RICH

I submit that is a most shocking admission, coming as it does from the Chief of the National Recovery Administration. It is capable of only one construction: Any concern rich enough to hire the right kind of lawyers may safely defy the National Recovery Act and the codes which have been framed by authority of that law.

But the "little fellow" does not enjoy any such immunity.

At the very moment when General Johnson was answering the questions of the editors, a Jersey City tailor was being arraigned on the charge of accepting 35 cents for pressing a suit, when the code for the cleaners and dyers' industry fixed 40 cents as the proper price.

The tailor was sent to jail for 30 days and fined $100. Evidently he did not have the money to hire one of the "best legal pilots" referred to by General Johnson.

That shows, Mr. President, that the big interests of this country, operating big business, are no more afraid of the N.R.A. code than any herd of cattle are afraid of a mulley. They are not the least bit worried about it, no more than the range cattle are afraid of one of their kind which has been dehorned. But when we come to a little old two-bit, two-by-four tailor who presses a pair of breeches for 35 cents when the code, on page 721, subsection (c), of paragraph DX, prescribes that the price shall be 40 cents instead of 35 cents, they yank up that poor little devil, put him in the penitentiary for 30 days, and take a hundred dollars away from him when probably he did not have a hundred dollars. They may claim they are doing a great service in reducing unemployment under the N.R.A., but instead of doing a service the statistics show, as a result of it, there has been an increase of unemployment to the extent of 800,000 since the month of October.

Mr. President, I do not present these statistics for any purpose except in line with the editorial that appears in the Philadelphia Record. I think our great trouble has been not that we have had too much of a liberal Government but that it has been entirely too reactionary, and that therein lies the fault.

I have been handed a letter this morning written by a former Member of this body. I do not join in all the criticisms that are made and in all the expressions that are sent in; I think some of us overpaint and others underpaint the picture considerably, and I believe, upon perusal, many of the statements would be modified; but, as showing the temper of our people and how the patience of the people is being taxed and is wearing away, there is in the State of Colorado a gentleman who is now in the later years of his life and who formerly was a Member of this body. I refer to former Senator Charles S. Thomas. I do not agree with many of the views of Mr. Thomas on political questions at all; I do not agree with some things he says; but I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, so that those who may care to read it will have an opportunity to do so without my reading it myself now, as my time has about expired, a copy of a letter that reached my hands, the original being addressed to Hon. ELMER THOMAS, United States Senator from Oklahoma, and dated April 15, 1934. I ask that it may be inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have figures of which I hope Senators will take cognizance. I am placing them in the RECORD today. We have had a business increase since October of 9 percent. I am advised, however, that 9 percent in dollars does not mean 9 percent in volume; that, as a matter of fact, the depreciation of the currency would show that we are doing a lesser volume of business than we did in the month of October last; that the 9 percent in dollars and cents is a mere currency adjustment, which does not mean that we have by volume increased our business. But figures for the manufacturing industry show that they increased their production 7.9 percent in dollars, from October 1933 to March 1934, but with an increase of 7.9 percent in business their employment shows only an increase of 4.1 percent, showing that instead of reversing the wheel whereby more men would be employed to obtain the same production the wheel has actually gone the other way, so that it has required only half the increase in labor to bring about a production which is double the labor percentage figure.

These figures show, Mr. President, that we are not coming along as we expected to come. I have been one of the boldest experimenters sitting in the United States Senate, even against my better judgment. I voted for the experiment, stating on the floor of the Senate that I did not think they were going to work but that I was willing to give the other man every chance; where there was anything like a reasonable outlook that it could possibly succeed, I would accord that chance and give it my vote. Accordingly, I voted for banking legislation, currency legislation, N.R.A.'s, P.W.A.'s, and various other letters—I have forgotten most of those alphabets. At any rate, I have voted for them as a matter of experiment; but when we have seen, as we now see at this date, after more than a year, that the experiments are going the other way, that unemployment is on the increase, that the people are not getting their share of the return, I think, Mr. President, that we ought to take note of these statistics.

I am fearful that this Congress is going to adjourn without doing the one thing that they could to correct it. The only thing that can be done is to do what we ran the campaign on—that we were going to provide for a distribution of the products of the land among the people. We have not failed in our efforts along that line, because we have never yet undertaken it. Unless we provide for distribution, there is no hope for these experiments, as I see it, to succeed. Our fault is not that we have not enough; we have too much; the fault is in the lack of distribution. I hate to see these experiments fail, because then the old Tory reactionary mind will come to the front and it will be said, "Oh, well, let us return to the old order; we have tried out the new scheme and the new scheme will not work"; whereas I contend that if the new scheme is allowed to fail, it will be because it has never been given a chance to work and cannot have until there is a distribution of products among the people and until there is a fair sharing among the people of what the land will yield.

I wanted to say, Mr. President, that I understand the C.W.A. rolls have about been discontinued. There were at one time about 4,000,000 men employed on the Civil Works Administration roll. I understand that roll has practically been discontinued. The money which was thus paid out naturally caused some increase in business, but we have nothing in the way of business revival to absorb the laying-off of that number of men.

Even though they won these victories, they brought their precious Dr. Wirt down to Washington to clamor about Bolshevism.

He had disheartened his liberal supporters by his more than fair-minded effort to meet the reactionaries half-way.

Tories shouted, anyway.

Let the President move forward with his old courage to the fundamental reforms America needs.

In his informal reply to the reactionaries, the President declares he is for evolution, not revolution.

Evolution necessitates basic improvements in our economic system—

Such reforms, in addition to unemployment insurance, as creation of a central bank; increased, not curtailed, C.W.A. and direct relief; a housing program to build America out of its slums; intensified drive for higher wages.

Unemployment insurance is a good start. The new bill will tax all employers 5 percent of pay rolls. States which adopt unemployment insurance plans of their own will be refunded the amount collected within their borders.

Since employers in States without compulsory unemployment insurance will have to pay anyway, all States will hasten to adopt the plan.

The Tories will scream "blue murder." But they scream "blue murder" at anything short of Hooverism. It is impossible to please them.

Our problem is saving America, not pacifying the reactionaries.

Millions of Americans, who have no clever lawyers in Washington, no lobbies, no propaganda machines, are hoping that the unemployment-insurance approval means resumption of the new deal.

EXHIBIT B

DENVER, COLO., April 15, 1934.

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS,
United States Senator, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 5th instant, enclosing copy of your speech before the National Women's Democratic Club, was received in due course, and should have been answered before. The subject, however, has become so disgusting to me because of present conditions that I have not had the heart to consider it much further. I am obliged to you, nevertheless, for your consideration of me in the premises. I may say that I am not in any wise dissappointed with this administration and have felt ever since it began that our party was under the thralldom of the most determined and at the same time the most ignorant influences that have ever been dominant in national affairs, so far as its financial policies are concerned. The President seems to be constitutionally opposed to the bimetallic system of money, knows nothing about it, does not want to know anything about it, and is congenitally averse to its discussion. All the traditions, surroundings, and tendencies of the man are in that direction, and the declarations of his party platform are of similar character. All of his advisers, and those possessing his confidence, seem to be equally ignorant and set against it. I have had that intuitive feeling from the start. Hence, I am not disappointed with the developments of the administration. We never had and never will have a look-in. Those who have directed financial legislation and who dominate the banking interests of the country have perceived the opportunity involved in the prevailing monetary conditions, which are more than chaotic, for a change of status of which advantage could be taken to the limit and which nothing but an overwhelming political sentiment could prevent. Hence control and management of the new President has become of outstanding and overwhelming importance. The result up to date must have been more than satisfactory to the advocates and proponents of the single standard.

Mr. Roosevelt's absolute domination of the party has been obvious from the moment of his inauguration. To my mind the banking panic, coming as it did with the new administration, was the most successful and best-planned event in the financial history of all time. That it has not been suspected and charged before is not its least feature. I am convinced that every step taken by those in power was taken in advance and occurred accordingly. The abdication by Congress of its powers and prerogatives was too rapid, and the emergency legislation enacted without deliberation was possible only as a result of that catastrophe. Hence the retirement of gold and the penalizing of its mere possession. Its demonetization, the debasement of its standard value in exchange and all the benumbing consequences were not a haphazard series of events, but the whole thing was foreplanned and made possible by a preconceived succession of events. What could not be planned was assumed, with consequences equally satisfactory. Our silver forces capitulated before they could be prevented, and our so-called "leaders" in that movement hoisted the white flag, threw down all defenses, and surrendered in advance; and the administration did not hesitate to ride rough-shod over all the safeguards and defenses essential to every government, and Mr. Roosevelt became, and since has been, as much a dictator as Stalin or Mussolini.

As far as I can see, the Department of Justice has also capitulated, so that Congress and the courts are equally subject to the prevailing conditions. My life is spent, and I am not personally concerned with the consequences, but I did expect something at the hands of those responsible for some show of relief through the American Congress calling itself democratic. Their abject cowardice and lack either of principle or public spirit admits of no extenuation or excuse. Their capitulation will inevitably prove to be that of the Republic. Hence, I solemnly affirm that the present President of the United States, has in my judgment, not only deliberately violated every principle embodied in the American Constitution indispensable to the preservation of what we were once pleased to call American liberty, but by his usurpations has struck a vital blow to the continuance of American institutions.

I have always believed that the demonetization of silver was the first step in our progress toward political extinction and now I know it.

I am sending copies of this letter to a few of my old friends and collaborators without any restrictions upon such use as they may see fit to make of it.

Yours most earnestly and sincerely,

C. S. THOMAS.

P.S.—If Roosevelt is a Democrat, I am not and never was. He should never dare to assert political kinship with any member of the party now or heretofore having the remotest conception of the word. It is nothing but a memory of something that now stinks to heaven. He should be repudiated as something anathema. If he is not, he must be accepted by posterity as everything that he is, that he is a colossal falsehood, false to mankind, and false to every tradition of the generation he commanded that he might betray.

Very sincerely yours,

CHARLES S. THOMAS.

THE NEW DEAL

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, since the Senator is quoting from a Democratic source some strictures and criticisms of the new deal under the present administration, I think an editorial from the Baltimore Sun of yesterday ought to go into the RECORD. I suppose if there is one newspaper in the United States that may be considered to be clearly a Democratic newspaper, it is the Baltimore Sun.

Mr. LONG. I deny that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Baltimore Sun contained an editorial yesterday entitled "A Flood of Apologies" and since the Senator has completed his remarks, I ask that the editorial may be read from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read, as requested:

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, Apr. 26, 1934]

A FLOOD OF APOLOGIES

The several speeches lately delivered by President Roosevelt and his Cabinet associates and more important subordinates in justification of the new deal suggest that the administration is now on the defensive. The nature of the speeches bears this out. They have been apologetic in tone and language, rather than expository or explanatory. The distinction is not without importance.

Our office dictionary defines "apology" as "something assigned as a reason for what appears to others wrong or unjustifiable * * * a justification or defense of belief or conduct." On the other hands, it says that "to explain" means "to make plain or clear; cause to be understood; show the meaning, nature, or workings of." If these definitions are sound, the Rossevelt, Wallace, Hull, and Tugwell speeches unmistakably come under the heading of "apology" rather than "explanation." In not one of these public addresses was there any real effort to come to grips with a major issue; no attempt was made, except in the vaguest, and most indirect way, to show the meaning, nature, or workings of the new deal. Rather were the remarks of these officials designed to meet the charges of "regimentation" and "revolution" raised in connection with the new deal by declaring that the Roosevelt program is even more Democratic than the liberal Democracy of the pre-1933 era and is not revolutionary but evolutionary. In short, the speakers were seeking to justify and defend the beliefs and conduct of the administration; they were apologizing instead of explaining.

Benjamin Jowett once wrote that "the tone of apology is always a tone of weakness and does injury to a good cause." To this it might be added that a good cause needs no apology; if it is really good, it can stand on its own feet. True, the administration has found it necessary for political and other reasons to meet in the most effective manner at its disposal the criticism of the new deal which seems to be arising on every hand, but especially among conservative business men. Yet it seems obvious that if the new dealers could offer a logical and consistent explanation of their course of action, they would undoubtedly have chosen to do so. That they have taken refuge in apologies indicates that not only are they on the defensive against their conservative critics but also that they harbor inner doubts as to the soundness of their cause.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Megill, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H.J.Res. 332) to provide appropriations to meet urgent needs in certain public services, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

THE AIR MAIL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3170) to revise air-mail laws.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss the matter before the Senate in any detail. I think it is impossible to read the excellent argument made by the distinguished senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] without reaching the definite conclusion that he supported every point he made with the law and the facts. I think any fair-minded person must agree with his conclusions that there was not even a suspicion of fraud involved in the contracts that were so suddenly canceled.

It will be remembered that this whole matter had been investigated in 1932 by a committee of the House of Representatives, a majority of which was composed of Democrats. They found nothing irregular in the granting of the contracts. This was unsatisfactory to the corporate interests that owned air lines, and immediately after the Presidential election in 1932 they organized for the specific purpose of having the contracts canceled. According to an Assistant Postmaster General, they descended like grasshoppers upon the present administration.

It is rather significant that the resolution creating the special committee, of which the senior Senator of Alabama [Mr. BLACK] is chairman, was passed in the month of February 1933 with the distinct provision that the members should not be appointed until after March 4, 1933, or until the Senate had passed into the control of the Democrats. There is the further fact that after the committee was organized its own investigator worked with the same corporate interests who so promptly organized after the election in 1932.

But, regardless of the motives of those who were most interested, it seems to me under normal conditions it might be expected that when the whole miserable facts were exposed, an effort would be made by the administration to correct the errors which had been committed. Or is it true that we are living in an age where the Government can do no wrong? Has the new era in which we are living crowded out the fundamental rights of the American citizens? Is there any love or respect left for the Federal Constitution?

There are those who cry out, "The Constitution! It shall not be destroyed!" In the midst of the administration's propaganda these words sound like a voice in the wilderness. Those defenders of the new deal who have been charged with a desire to regiment the principal activities of American citizens everywhere deny the charge. They insist that the new deal is merely a new democracy made necessary by the changed conditions.

The Secretary of Agriculture declares that the enemies of the Republic—> are those organizers of public opinion and those politicians who knowingly and hypocritically endeavor to place the tag of communism on liberal democratic principles in order that they may gain votes or preserve inordinate profits.

Those of us who believe in the Constitution and who are opposed to destroying it do not accept a new democracy which violates either the letter or the spirit of that great document. It must be perfectly clear to every thoughtful person that many persons who seem to have a controlling influence with this administration believe that they are within the Constitution so long as the framework of it is preserved. I do not charge them with attempting to change the manner of the selection of the executive, the legislative, or the judicial branches of the Government, but it seems to me that to their minds these are the only things in the Constitution that are essential.

More than that, the attack upon the Constitution is from two separate groups. To the average persons who have acquainted themselves with the air-mail cancelation facts, Mr. Farley will be charged with actually mutilating the Constitution. No reasonable person can doubt that it was an arbitrary use, as well as the abuse, of a great political power. Whatever else may be said, it is not too much to say it will forever remain a black page in the history of a great Republic. It cannot be compared with the mere removal of Republican postmasters for purely political reasons. A casual glance at the names of postmasters all over the country show that in many instances the man named was to take the place of some person who was removed. But this use of political power can be overcome. I only mention it because of the nonpartisan, angelic bloodstream which we are led to believe pulsates in every function of this administration.

But, I should like to inquire of those new dealers of this new Democracy, who call us enemies of the country because we charge that the country is drifting to communism, what they think of the recent performance in New Jersey where a man was fined $100 and sent to jail for 30 days for charging 35 cents for pressing a suit instead of 40 cents fixed by the code?

I have no doubt that these same persons who are trying to bring about a new social order would have been shocked if this man in New Jersey had been fined $100 and sent to jail for 30 days for stealing a 15-cent quart of milk from some corporation engaged in distributing milk. I can hear them now talking about the poor tailor who had not been able to earn enough pressing clothes to feed his wife and four children and what a terrible injustice was being done because he was sent to jail for stealing 15 cents' worth of food. This poor tailor, however, had stolen nothing. He was working for a living. The amount involved was 5 cents, and the crime was charging 5 cents less than some code authority said he must charge.

I was impressed with the proceedings whereby the fine and sentence were suspended after a week-end in jail away from his family. The newspaper reports were to the effect that this poor defendant had promised the judge that hereafter "he would be a good citizen."

Is this a part of the new democracy about which Mr. Tugwell and Secretary Wallace boast? Is this the kind of a democracy that impresses this poor foreigner with the sacredness of our Constitution? Could anybody a year ago anticipate that such a thing could happen in this country? Does anybody dare say that this is not the result of the kind of a regimentation which is sure to lead us into dangerous places and which must be avoided at all costs?

Some days ago I had an inquiry from a man who runs a small grocery store in my State. He employs no help. He has signed no contract of any kind with the Government. The Blue Eagle has not entered his store, but a demand was made upon him by the retail grocers' code authorities demanding that he pay $1 immediately for himself and for any clerk in his employ toward the expenses of the retail grocer's code, and that upon failure to pay, he was threatened with a report of the facts to Washington. He wanted to know of me whether or not, as an American citizen, under these circumstances he was compelled to pay this $1 in response to this demand.

My understanding is that this is the practice of the code authorities, and I have recently seen that the authority was based upon an Executive order of the President of the United States. This $1 is not a tax levied upon an American citizen by the Congress of the United States. It is not a fine imposed by any court for the violation of some law. It is an assessment imposed by an organization which this man never joined, which is of no service to him, and with which he wants nothing to do. The new democracy calls those who oppose this kind of regimentation enemies of the country; but it seems to me that we cannot possibly approve of this sort of thing and at the same time have a very friendly interest in the Federal Constitution.

But if there be any doubt about this being a definite policy of the administration and not merely a plan to meet an emergency, take a view of the proposed stock exchange bill which has been reported by the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate. In that will be found a provision for the selection of a commission, at large salaries, by the President of the United States, with authority to employ counsel and all kinds of help that may be needed, and with authority to assess the persons controlled by the act a sufficient sum of money to pay all expenses of the commission. Here is another effort to change our system of government. If a stock exchange bill be necessary in the interest of the public, why should not the public pay this bill just as it pays all other bills that pertain to governmental functions? It is a transfer of the taxing powers from the Congress to some commission. Those levying this tax do not have to answer to the persons who pay the tax. The persons who pay the tax have no right in the matter of the selection of those who impose it. This takes us back to things we suffered before the Revolution.

I cite these illustrations because they represent three distinct classes. One, the tailor being prosecuted for charging too little for his labor; one, a small business man who has no interest in the code that binds him; and the other, representing the wealthier class, against which the new dealers are constantly attempting to create a prejudice. It seems to me also that these illustrations demonstrate once again the greatness of the Federal Constitution in its protection of all classes of our citizens, as well as the danger to each class when we for one reason or another attempt to get away from the restrictions imposed upon us by its terms.

Think of the confidence that is destroyed in our form of Government when, by the act of some high official, governmental contracts can be destroyed by a stroke of the pen, upon some flimsy excuse, without a hearing and without redress of any kind.

Think of the condition of mind of the thousands of persons in the position of the poor New Jersey tailor who have been led to believe from their early childhood that they lived in a country where their lawful pursuits were protected but now find no protection under the Federal Constitution.

Think of the harassed taxpayer who finds a new tax imposed upon him by some organization or some commission in which he has no representation.

If this is what liberal democracy means, if this be evolution in America, if this be the growth that is sought, if this be the act of unfolding or developing, then the Federal Constitution has indeed become an empty symbol; and those of us who are called our country's enemies must renew our determination that it shall not be destroyed.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, it is a matter of regret to me that the pending legislation is before the Senate at this time. It relates to a subject matter the study of which was committed to a special committee of the Senate. The special committee has been carrying on that study for months. The testimony has not yet been concluded; and the committee, as such, has never considered its recommendations to be made to this body. So far as I know and believe, there is but a single member of the special committee with whom the pending bill finds favor.

The bill is here, ill-advised as I believe, because of the regrettable action of the Postmaster General in canceling all the air-mail contracts within the continental United States. I shall not discuss in any detail the evidence taken before our committee with respect to the cancelations of these contracts, or with respect to the facts alleged to be in justification thereof. That already has been done with ability and thoroughness by two members of the committee; and I note with interest that their views are absolutely irreconcilable. My own judgment is that the attempted cancelation of the contracts can find no justification in fact, in law, or in the public interest.

Mr. President, between the years 1929 and 1932 this country of ours witnessed an amazing development in the aviation industry.

In 1929 there were being carried by the air carrier 6,635,000 pounds of mail. By 1932 that poundage had increased to more than 8,845,000 pounds.

In 1929 there were approximately 14,000 miles of air lines. In 1932 there were more than 25,000 miles.

In 1929 the mileage flown was approximately 500,000 miles a month. In the latter part of 1933 that mileage was more than 3,300,000 miles per month.

Mr. President, the rate cost to the Government for the carriage of the mails had been reduced from $1.15 in 1929 to approximately 37 cents in the latter part of the past year; and yet, in spite of this reduction in rates and in cost to the Government, we have seen a magnificent system of transportation by air built up in the United States.

When the former Postmaster General came into office, he found the transportation service of the Nation by air carried on by scattered, disjointed lines, inadequate in financial and in technical resources, without the capacity in these respects to respond to the demands of the Nation. He took those scattered units and welded them into a great system. He conceived three great transcontinental lines running from coast to coast, and lines running from Canada to the Gulf. He conceived these transcontinental lines each to be under unified control, each of them to be parallel somewhat with the other, and to be competitive in service, with lateral connections and feeders.

Mr. President, as a result of his administration there was developed a system of air transportation which carried the mail throughout continental United States with amazing speed, which furnished air transportation for persons and for things and which contributed mightily to the national defense—a system without comparison among all the nations of the world; and yet on the 9th day of February of this year, almost in the twinkling of an eye, without notice, without hearing, without opportunity for defense, the Postmaster General struck down these contracts, the very foundation upon which this great development was builded.

Mr. President, various causes have been alleged for this action. If it had been charged that the former Postmaster General was tactless and dictatorial, I should have admitted the charge. If there had been a challenge as to the soundness of his conception, I should have agreed that men might honestly differ concerning it. But when there is a charge of collusion and of conspiracy, I deny that charge. When it is asserted that these extensions of time were made without authority of law, I point to the law which in express terms authorized them. When it is charged that there was collusive agreement to eliminate competitive bidding, I likewise deny that charge; and I deny with equal directness and positiveness the allegation that there was fraud in connection with the contracts.

Mr. President, there has been the charge of collusion and conspiracy. It rests upon the fact that in May and June of 1930 the Postmaster General of the United States called together those who held contracts, and some who did not hold contracts, for conference with them and between them, in order that an effort might be made to determine who had the pioneering rights in these various scattered units of transportation, that there might be an exchange of information and that an effort might be made to unify, to consolidate, to build up a more efficient transportation in the United States.

Those meetings were not secret. They were not furtive. They were open. They were known. They were public. Why, Mr. President, the aviation journals of the country and the press of the country carried notice to all our citizens of the essential facts of those meetings and of the purposes of those meetings. Everyone interested in aviation knew of them. A record was made and preserved in the files of the Department of those meetings, of the discussions, of the agreements reached, and of the failures to reach agreements.

Mr. President, it is no more possible to justify the charge of collusion and conspiracy with respect to those meetings than it is possible to justify a charge against any official of the Government of the United States who talks with interested parties about any duty or obligation resting upon him as such official.

There is no difference in principle beween that meeting and the meeting of the present First Assistant Postmaster General, held but a few months ago, in order to consider service, in order to consider consolidations and eliminations, that the services might be brought within the limits of the appropriation.

There is no essential difference in principle between that meeting and the meetings of those business men of the United States, who have repeatedly been called here, in recent months, that they might sit down and confer together, and confer with officials of the Government of the United States, in the workout-out of codes to regulate the business and the conduct of their various industries. There is no essential difference between that meeting and the meetings of those who gathered here in order to consider with the Secretary of Agriculture the levying of processing taxes and compensatory taxes upon the citizens of the United States. It was a meeting conceived in good faith, justified by sound sense. It was a meeting like unto a thousand meetings which have been held in the past, and which will be held in the years to come. There can be no justification for the charge of collusion and conspiracy with respect to that, for the very vital elements making up conspiracy and collusion were wanting.

The charge is made that there was no authority in law for these 6-month extensions which were granted. The Senator from Vermont called the attention of the Senate, as he has called the attention of the country, to the specific authority in law for the identical thing that was done.

Mr. President, it has been said that there were agreements designed to restrict, to eliminate, and to reduce competition in bidding. If one reads this testimony in its entirety, and not in fragments, if he looks at the whole body of the record, he will find no evidence to sustain that charge. It is true that as consolidations of these various lines are worked out, the number of potential bidders is reduced. That is inevitable. It is true that the Postmaster General of the United States consulted with various carriers in the Air Service with respect to consolidations. I do not doubt that he recommended—I do not doubt that he urged—consolidations, and the statute, in express terms, authorized him to make consolidations. One may not predicate a charge of restriction in bidding upon acts which, in terms, are authorized by a statute of the United States.

The charge of fraud is a wholesale charge; it is a consolidated charge; it is a merger of all else; it is an omnibus count. I have heard nothing in connection with the general charge which does not relate directly to one of the specific charges to which I have already referred.

Mr. President, I deny that there was fraud. For 4 years this situation had existed. For 4 years it had been known to committees of the Congress of the United States; it had been known to the Members of the Congress. These contracts had been under inquiry yearly by the Committees on Appropriations of the House and of the Senate, and the facts were known to them. The facts in connection with these contracts had been the subject of a special investigation by a committee of the House of Representatives. The contracts and the payments thereunder had been sanctioned by the Comptroller General of the United States every time he gave approval to a payment called for by their terms.

Mr. President, these contracts had continued unchallenged for 10 months after the present administration came into power. They were unchallenged on the 30th day of January of this year, when the Postmaster General, testifying before your select committee, said that he had not disapproved any contract, and that we were warranted in the assumption that that failure to act on his part might be considered an approval of them.

Yet 6 days thereafter, after the lapse of 4 years of sanction, after the lapse of 4 years during which the United States had been operating under these contracts and the people had been profiting thereby, they were ruthlessly struck down, in my view struck down in violation of law, in outrage on fair play, and in defiance of American tradition.

Mr. President, I can find no warrant in the record, I can find no warrant in the law, for the thing which has been done. But what has been done is of the past, and I recognize that there is no particular advantage in discussing it further. It is a fact accomplished, about which in due time the American people will pass judgment, if they have not already done so in their own minds.

Mr. President, we have pending before us at this time four distinct proposals for the consideration of this body. There is the amendment proposed jointly by the Senator from Vermont and myself, providing that the status quo as of February 9 shall be restored, that the contractors shall be reestablished in their rights, and that they shall face the burden of the obligations of their contracts; that there shall be a commission appointed by the President of the United States to consider the situation in which we find ourselves, and to make recommendations to the Congress for an air policy. In my opinion, good conscience calls for the adoption of that amendment.

There is another amendment, proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. In greater detail it carries out the identical suggestions of the first amendment to which I have referred.

Then there is the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], a thought-out, logical plan for the solution of the difficulties confronting us.

Mr. President, the plan of the Senator from Nevada reflects credit upon him. In his proposal can be seen the mind and the temperament of one who has risen to distinction among the jurists of the western part of this Nation of ours. I do not hesitate to say that if the first two amendments to which I have referred be not adopted, then I will give my unqualified endorsement to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada as being better in every essential respect, sounder in principle, more workable in its practical operations, than the bill now pending before the Senate.

If I may, I will refer very hurriedly to some of the provisions in the pending bill which give me concern. I do not speak dogmatically with respect to them, but what I say is rather in the form of questions respecting their terms and their effect.

In the first section we are asked to repeal portions of our air mail law, but to leave other provisions in full force and effect. In particular, section 3 of the act of 1925, as amended by the act of 1928, placing a minimum rate on airmail postage is amended and the rate is fixed at 6 cents an ounce.

In section 3 of the bill the Postmaster General is authorized to award contracts for the transportation of air mail by airplane between such points as he, the Postmaster General, may designate. I emphasize that in order that Senators may have it in mind when I come to a subsequent section of the bill.

The provision is in substance that the Postmaster General is authorized to award contracts for the transportation of air mail between such points as he may designate, and for periods of not exceeding 3 years, to the lowest responsible bidders.

At fixed rates per airplane-mile, with a definite weight basis, and with a maximum payment of not to exceed 40 cents a mile, I believe it is, as fixed in this section.

I note that in these first two sections to which I have made reference there is a postage rate fixed arbitrarily by statute, and a cost of carriage, to be fixed by competitive bid, with the result that there may be no logical connection whatsoever between the postage rates and the cost of the service.

The section further provides that a contract may not be assigned without the approval of the Postmaster General and the Interstate Commerce Commission, so that under these first three sections of the bill two agencies of the Government would be involved in the problem of transportation, the Postmaster General and the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The same section authorizes extensions. If I may use the word so often repeated here on this floor in connection with this controversy, it does not say an extension must be the elongation of a line under contract, not in prolongation of an existing service, but just an extension, a recognition of the very principle which has been condemned here in unmeasured terms.

Then, after having recognized the soundness of the principle of extension, the section runs away from it, beats a cowardly retreat from the principle which it declares, when it limits an extension to 100 miles and when it says that there may be but one extension to one person.

Now, what does that mean in practical effect? That means, for example, that if one has a contract for service between Washington and Pittsburgh, there may be an extension, we will say, from Pittsburgh down to Wheeling, if that is within 100 miles; but there may not be, under the terms of the act as it is proposed, an extension from Washington to Baltimore. So far as it does that, I can see no sense in it whatsoever. I can see no warrant for a limitation to 100 miles of an extension, for it is a wholly uneconomic distance for an airplane run, and if the principle is sound, and if extensions under any circumstances ought to be granted, I can see no good reason for saying that one may be granted at one end of the contractual line, but another may not be granted at the other end of the line.

The section also authorizes the Postmaster General to designate routes as primary and secondary, but for what purposes these routes are to be designated as primary and secondary I do not know, for there is no further reference to primary and secondary routes in the entire legislation. It seems to be language with no purpose whatsoever.

Then I come to section 6, Mr. President. Section 6 of this legislation—and I am talking about the pending bill all the while—authorizes and directs the Interstate Commerce Commission within 6 months prior to the time of expiration of the contracts entered into under section 3—that is, within 6 months of the expiration of the 3-year contracts entered into by the Postmaster General upon routes designated by him—to fix and determine—

The public convenience and necessity for all air-transport routes and the fair and reasonable future rates of compensation for the transportation of such mail matter by airplane common carriers and the service connected therewith, but not in excess of the rates—

Provided in section 3—which I take it to be that 40-cent maximum—prescribing the method or methods by weight or space—

That is the rule laid down with respect to the Postmaster General under section 3—or otherwise.

It gives the Interstate Commerce Commission a blanket authority to proceed to prescribe the method for ascertaining the rates of compensation under, apparently, any rule that the Interstate Commerce Commission can conceive of, although the Postmaster General in letting his contracts is limited by a fixed rule based upon weight and space.

There may be some reason for that difference. There may be some reason for those words "or otherwise", which have no limitation beyond the imagination of the Interstate Commerce Commission; but it is beyond my knowledge or my ingenuity to think of what it may be.

Then it provides in this same section—and this is an interesting provision to me—that the rate so made, that is, the rate made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, based on weight or space or otherwise, shall continue in force until changed by the Commission, after due notice and hearing.

It strikes me as significant and altogether irrational that although notice and a hearing are required for a change in the order fixing the rates that there is no requirement for hearing or for notice upon the original fixing of the rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It would strike me that it is vastly more important to reach a sound conclusion as to what the rates should be in the first instance, after notice and after hearing, than that subsequent changes in the rates should be the subject of notice and of hearing.

Then, Mr. President, this fact strikes my attention: That although bids under section 3 are to be based and contracts let by the Postmaster General at fixed rates per airplane-mile and with a definite rate and space basis under section 6, the Interstate Commerce Commission may disregard weight and space and otherwise ascertain rates of compensation. That is substantially what I said just a moment ago. Why that is I do not know. I do not see how we can possibly square the rate-making rule under the Interstate Commerce Commission authority and the rate-making rule or the cost rule fixed by the Postmaster General, and why they should be different is beyond my power to understand.

Mr. President, one assumes the purpose in giving the Interstate Commerce Commission authority and directing it to determine public convenience and necessity, as section 6 does, is to limit the contracts to such routes as may be thus legalized. But I call attention to the fact that the power to contract is still left with the Postmaster General, and there is no language in this act express—I believe there is no language in this act implied—limiting his right to designate points between which air mail may be carried.

What advantage is it to have the Interstate Commerce Commission determine public convenience and necessity, apparently for the purpose of limiting contracts to such routes, and leaving unchanged and untouched and unchallenged the authority of the Postmaster General to designate routes between which the mail of the United States shall be carried?

Mr. President, this section also precludes rates which will include compensation by way of subsidy or other similar payments. I ask the question: Does this forbid a rate which will give a return in excess of the cost of transportation—of the service? I ask, When does compensation become a subsidy? The thing to me is utterly unintelligible.

I pass over section 7. It seems to me that section 7, being taken as a whole——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair). The time of the Senator on the amendment has expired.

Mr. WHITE. I will proceed for a brief moment, Mr. President, on the bill. So long as I am not going to get through in my 30 minutes, I will discuss somewhat further section 7.

The first paragraph of section 7 makes it unlawful for a contractor to have an interest in a manufacturing company, or a company owning a field or hangars, or land equipment or repair plant, any air fields, the facilities along the ground necessary for an air transportation company, and so forth, with the result that the contractor must be so financed that it can itself own all these facilities, or it must be relegated to a seller's market when it comes to buy these necessary parts of our transportation equipment, those necessary things for the convenient and safe transportation of the mail and of the persons of the United States.

The second paragraph makes it unlawful for any corporation or any individual interested in any company furnishing aviation equipment, or fields or hangars, or airways, and so forth, to have any stock or other interest in a contractor.

I ask the Senate, who is to finance these air-transportation companies? Where is the money coming from in order to buy these planes, to buy the radio equipment, to build the facilities along the ground, airports, the hangars, all else which is essential? Who is to do this? Who is to finance this if no one may have an interest in a contracting company?

The third paragraph provides that no person shall be eligible as an air-mail contractor if he has an officer "or another"—I do not know what that "or another" means—but if he has an officer or another who has theretofore entered into any unlawful combination or conspiracy to prevent the making of any bid to carry the mail.

Does this mean a person "or another" who has been convicted under a statute making such acts illegal, or does it mean that anyone charged with this offense by any official of the Government becomes ineligible for any such relationship?

Mr. President, there is a proviso to this section which lessens somewhat the severity of this general language; but taking it as a whole it reduces itself, as I see, to this absurdity, that these people must finance themselves or they must buy in a market controlled and dictated by the sellers of the necessary equipment which they must have.

Then I skip to section 11, Mr. President. Section 11 illustrates to my mind the basic infirmity of this proposal before the Senate.

By this section the Secretary of Commerce appears in the picture in addition to the Postmaster General, in addition to the Postmaster General and the Interstate Commerce Commission acting jointly, in addition to the Interstate Commerce Commission acting separately. The Secretary of Commerce is given air-mail authority. He is to determine the character of the equipment to be employed and maintained on routes, the speed, the load capacity, the safety features and the safety devices.

Mr. President, after the expiration of the contracts to be let by the Posmaster General under this bill, the Interstate Commerce Commission is to determine fair and reasonable rates. I ask you, sir, how the Interstate Commerce Commission is to do this? How is it to determine fair and reasonable rates if it is without knowledge or control over the determination of the character of equipment, which power is lodged in the Secretary of Commerce? It is proposed to give the Secretary of Commerce the authority to prescribe the entire equipment and then to give the Interstate Commerce Commission, with no relationship between them, with no obligation to transmit from one to the other the information requisite to a wise determination of the matter of rates, the authority to prescribe just and reasonable rates.

Section 13 attempts to fix a minimum rate of compensation, but there is absolutely no machinery provided by the proposed legislation for the ascertainment of such a rate.

Mr. President, I have gone hurriedly through this proposed piece of legislation, and I have suggested for the consideration of the Senate defects which seem to me to be inherent in it, and which, in my opinion, cannot be cured without the rewriting of the measure in its entirety.

My consideration of this bill, hasty though it has been, leads me back to my first proposition, that the Senate of the United States should adopt one or the other of the three alternatives which are presented to it. I would urge, with whatever force I may have, that the proposal of Senator AUSTIN and of myself restoring the status quo, restoring these contracts to the men who have had them and who have served the Government for 4 years of time, be adopted. I would urge that they be restored to their rights, and that they be required to meet their obligations under the contracts. I do that with the more readiness, because the rates of compensation under present law are within the control of the Postmaster General so that he can change them from time to time downward or upward as the situation and the rights and the well-being of the people of the country may require. That would seem to be the American course; that, in my judgment, would heed the voice of equity calling to the Senate of the United States.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, it may seem, and I think justly so, a supererogation for me to add anything to the very eloquent and very convincing address of my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE]. I would not undertake to say anything further were it not for a deep earnestness and a desire at least to make a record here which may be of benefit in the future even though it may not persuade anyone in the United States Senate to change his vote.

As I have listened to the very able addresses on all sides of this question—and I regard every address which has been delivered here as an able one—it has occurred to me to be very singular that there are so few Senators who believe in the pending bill and that there seems to be some sort of restraint upon those who do not really favor it which does not admit of their joining in an obviously beneficial proposal for the people of this country, in joining in the movement which has for its objective the clearing of the atmosphere of all ulterior motives and purposes of all the little excursions into the realm of party politics, and of all attempts at condemnation and the blackening of our neighbors with opprobrious words and epithets such as have been hurled at them.

The adoption of the substitute submitted by the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] and myself would not determine any question of fact; it would merely keep the status unaffected by any of the events that have occurred since February 9 until the questions which are now pending regarding those events could be satisfactorily investigated and determined.

I will refer to another feature which seems singular to me. After reading over and over again the statutes in effect relating to the cancelation of air-mail contracts, which are clear and without ambiguity and which have been interpreted by opinions of the Comptroller General, at the request of the Postmaster General, aimed directly at ascertaining what his authority might be with respect to such cancelation, after knowing that there must be notice and hearing—in other words, the usual American procedure before depriving a man of his contract by cancelation or taking his property away from him—after knowing that the only manner in which the President of the United States may cancel is upon 60 days' notice and hearing; after knowing that by the terms of the contracts themselves the only way by which the cancelation may occur is upon 60 days' notice, as required by the contracts, we have had the remarkable experience of listening here to a debate in which it is claimed that the Postmaster General had authority to annul these contracts by virtue of section 3950 of an ancient statute, passed in 1872, which obviously never was intended to apply to any such condition of affairs as we have today. Yet the argument is made that that section of the law authorized the Postmaster General to annul the air-mail contracts. To my mind, that is the most outstandingly astonishing thing that has occurred in this debate.

Do you realize, Mr. President, how that section reads? This is the way it reads, this old statute of 1872, which relates to bids:

> Combinations to prevent bids: No contract for carrying the mail shall be made with any person who has entered, or proposed to enter, into any combination to prevent the making of any bid for carrying the mail, or who has made any agreement, or given or performed, or promised to give or perform, any consideration whatever to induce any other person not to bid for any such contract—

That does not apply in this case at all—

> and if any person so offending is a contractor for carrying the mail, his contract may be annulled; and for the first offense the person so offending shall be disqualified to contract for carrying the mail for 5 years, and for the second offense shall be forever disqualified.

Mr. President, did you hear anything about the Postmaster General being invested with the authority to annul contracts in that section of the law? No; you did not. There is not one word in that law that authorizes a Cabinet officer to annul contracts. And when the statute of the Federal Congress undertakes to create an offense, do you, Mr. President, suspect for a moment that invests the punishment of such offense in a Cabinet officer? And when it has said that the contract may be annulled, do you, sir, consider that it enabled any other tribunal except a court of law to annul it? I do not. If it did, it would be utterly inconsistent with the Constitution; it would have constituted a perfect bill of attainder, something that is expressly prohibited by the Constitution. Just think of it! The Congress could disqualify, forever and without trial, men guilty of an offense, whose offense had never been ascertained, but presumed by some Cabinet officer—an assumed offense. Think of such a condition under our institutions of government! We have tolerated much during the last year; but are we about to tolerate this deed?

I have a brief here on that subject, and in order to save the nerves of Senators, I shall not read it, but I ask unanimous consent to have it inserted in the RECORD at this place in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The brief referred to is as follows:

It has often happened that when a matter has become the subject of acrimonious debate, the principal points become submerged and are frequently forgotten. There is one point of fundamental importance which, so far as I know, has not even been discussed, and that is the constitutionality of section 3950 of the Revised Statutes, which is printed as section 432 of title 39 of the United States Code, annotated. That section reads as follows:

"Combinations to prevent bids: No contract for carrying the mail shall be made with any person who has entered or proposed to enter into any combination to prevent the making of any bid for carrying the mail, or who has made any agreement, or given or performed, or promised to give or perform, any consideration whatever to induce any other person not to bid for any such contract; and if any person so offending is a contractor for carrying the mail, his contract may be annulled; and for the first offense the person so offending shall be disqualified to contract for carrying the mail for 5 years, and for the second offense shall be forever disqualified."

This is the section under which the Postmaster General acted in issuing his annulment orders of February 9, 1934. Copies of that order have been printed in many connections in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The order directly refers to and relies on the provisions of the statute which I have quoted above. The Postmaster General's order is very brief. It does not state any facts to show that any particular contractor gave or performed, or promised to give or perform, any consideration whatever to induce any other person not to bid for the particular contract which he was engaged in performing for the United States. The Postmaster General's order does not specify any bid that was prevented. Please observe that there is no grant of authority to the Postmaster General to annul a mail contract. The statute is entirely silent on the subject, and there is no indication whatever of the procedure to be followed in order to bring about a valid annulment.

The penalty provided in the quoted statute is that the person so offending shall be disqualified to contract for carrying the mail for 5 years for the first offense and forever if the offense is repeated. This is an unusual penalty. The offense is not designated as a crime, and there is no penalty by way of fine or imprisonment. Nevertheless, the penalty is a very severe one so far as air-mail contractors are concerned; because a 5-year disqualification from bidding for contracts means, under the circumstances surrounding this new business, the bankruptcy and corporate death of the contractor.

A provision carrying such a severe penalty is clearly a bill of attainder. Article I, section 9, of the Constitution of the United States, provides that Congress shall not pass any bill of attainder. And section 10 provides that no State shall pass any bill of attainder. Bills of attainder have become so thoroughly obsolete that the meaning of the word itself is not known to many people. Mr. Justice Field, one of the most distinguished Chief Justices of the United States, gave the following succinct definition: "A bill of attainder is a legislative act which inflicts punishment without a judicial trial."

It is obvious that the Congress provided for the infliction of a punishment in section 3950, which I have quoted above. But it is equally obvious that Congress intended that the statute should be constitutional and not violative of the attainder clause of the Constitution. The only construction of that statute that would permit an avoidance of a certain holding that the statute is unconstitutional would be a construction that would require a judicial trial before the infliction of the severe penalty of disqualification. Such is the only reasonable construction to be put on the statute read as a whole. The care with which Congress avoided a grant of authority to the Postmaster General to annul contracts indicates that the congressional intent is to have a trial and definite finding that a particular contractor had entered into a combination to prevent a bid or had paid a consideration to prevent the making of a competitive bid before the infliction of the penalty.

The matter has not been before the courts on very many occasions, simply because it has so rarely happened that a member of the executive branch of the Government has undertaken to inflict a penalty without making specific charges before the judicial branch of the Government, confronting the person charged with witnesses, and proceeding to secure a determination of guilt before the infliction of a penalty. But in the cases that have gone to the Supreme Court the rulings have been entirely unanimous. This body has always gone to the greatest lengths to uphold and support the Constitution and to see to it that bills presented for its consideration were not violative of any section of that great document. Such has been the tradition of the Senate, and it is to be assumed that the Senate in 1872, when it passed the statute which I have quoted, believed that it was a constitutional enactment and that no step would be taken under it without a judicial trial, thereby exposing the statute to an attack on the ground of unconstitutionality.

The Senate would do well to read some of the cases that have come before the Supreme Court of the United States, such as Cummings v. The State of Missouri, reported in Fourth Wallace, page 277, which considered a statute of the State of Missouri providing that no person could be a qualified voter "who has ever been in armed hostility to the United States or to the lawful authorities thereof or to the government of this State." The same statute provided that any person suffering from the disabilities indicated should never act as a professor or teacher in any educational institution or in any common or other school, nor should ever hold property in trust for the use of any church, religious society, or congregation, and an oath was required before an applicant could vote. In September 1865 the Reverend Mr. Cummings, a priest of the Roman Catholic Church, was indicted and convicted in the Circuit Court of Pike County "of the crime of teaching and preaching in that month as a priest and minister of that religious denomination without having first taken the oath prescribed by the constitution of the State." He was sentenced to a fine of $500 and to commitment in jail until said fine was paid. The conviction was sustained by the supreme court of the State.

On appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, Justice Field, delivering the opinion, reversed the finding of the supreme court of the State, holding that the law in question was in the nature of a bill of attainder or ex post facto law.

In Ex Parte Garland (4 Wall. 333), an act of Congress was involved, which act required certain oaths to be taken by any person holding an office under the United States, while another act provided that no one could be admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States or of a district court as an attorney to practice therein until he had taken and subscribed the oath prescribed by the first act referred to, which oath provided, among other things, that the deponent had never voluntarily borne arms against the United States, and that he had never voluntarily given aid to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto. Like the Missouri law referred to in the Cummings case, these acts of Congress, passed in 1862 and 1865, were clearly intended to debar from practicing in the courts of the United States lawyers residing in a large section of the United States.

A. H. Garland, who had been duly qualified to practice in the Supreme Court of the United States prior to the Civil War, was a member of the Confederate Congress, and as such unable to take the oath, though pardoned in July 1865. He applied to the Court for permission to continue to practice therein. The Court amended its rule requiring the oath above referred to by eliminating it and granted the prayer of Garland's petition. In his opinion Justice Field said:

"The statute is directed against parties who have offended in any of the particulars embraced by these clauses. And its object is to exclude them from the profession of the law, or at least from its practice in the courts of the United States. As the oath prescribed cannot be taken by these parties, the act, as against them, operates as a legislative decree of perpetual exclusion. And exclusion from any of the professions or any of the ordinary avocations of life for past conduct can be regarded in no other light than as punishment for such conduct. The exaction of the oath is the mode provided for ascertaining the parties upon whom the act is intended to operate, and instead of lessening, increases its objectionable character. All enactments of this kind partake of the nature of bills of pains and penalties, and are subject to the constitutional inhibition against the passage of bills of attainder, under which general designation they are included.

"In the exclusion which the statute adjudges it imposes a punishment for some of the acts specified which were not punishable at the time they were committed; and for other of the acts it adds a new punishment to that before prescribed and it is thus brought within the further inhibition of the Constitution against the passage of an ex post facto law. In the case of Cummings against the State of Missouri, just decided, we have had occasion to consider at length the meaning of a bill of attainder and of an ex post facto law in the clause of the Constitution forbidding their passage by the States, and it is unnecessary to repeat here what we there said. A like prohibition is contained in the Constitution against enactments of this kind by Congress; and the argument presented in that case against certain clauses of the constitution of Missouri is equally applicable to the act of Congress under consideration in this case.

"The attorney and counselor being, by the solemn judicial act of the court, clothed with his office does not hold it as a matter of grace and favor. The right which it confers upon him to appear for suitors, and to argue causes, is something more than a mere indulgence, revocable at the pleasure of the court, or at the command of the legislature. It is a right of which he can only be deprived by the judgment of the Court, for moral or professional delinquency.

"The legislature may undoubtedly prescribe qualifications for the office, to which he must conform, as it may, where it has exclusive jurisdiction, prescribe qualifications for the pursuit of any of the ordinary avocations of life. The question, in this case, is not as to the power of Congress to prescribe qualifications but whether that power has been exercised as a means for the infliction of punishment against the prohibition of the Constitution. That this result cannot be effected indirectly by a State under the form of creating qualifications we have held in the case of Cummings v. The State of Missouri, and the reasoning by which that conclusion was reached applies equally to similar action on the part of Congress."

Neither the Cummings nor the Garland case has been reversed. On the contrary, both have been, and are, frequently cited with approval by many courts.

Pierce v. Carskadon (16 Wall. 234): The law of West Virginia provided that, where a judgment was rendered against a nonresident, based upon an attachment, and there was no personal service and judgment was entered without the defendant's appearance, such defendant had a right, within a certain specified period of time, to reopen the case upon his petition and to make his defense to the proceedings.

One Carskadon obtained a judgment in one of the courts of West Virginia against Pierce, based on an attachment. Thereafter Pierce appeared within the time prescribed and sought to have the case reopened in accordance with the statute of West Virginia, but the court refused to do so, because there had in the meantime, to wit, on February 11, 1865, been an amendatory statute which provided that a petition to reopen the case could not be presented unless accompanied by an affidavit that the defendant had never borne arms against the United States and the other conditions contained in the then test oaths then prevalent.

The court refused to let the petition be filed, and on appeal to the Court of Appeals of West Virginia it was sustained. Appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States upon the ground that the act was unconstitutional, since it deprived the defendant for past misconduct, and without judicial trial, of an existing right, the West Virginia law partook of the nature of a bill of pains and penalties and was subject to the constitutional inhibition against the passage of bills of attainder, under which general designation bills of pains and penalties are included. The Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the Court of Appeals of West Virginia, upon the authority of the Cummings case and Ex parte Garland. The opinion of the Court, delivered by Justice Field, is brief, merely stating that the instant case was covered by the Cummings and Garland cases, and upon the authority of those cases the judgment of the West Virginia court was reversed.

In the Cummings case the penalty had the effect of excluding a priest from the practice of his profession. In the Garland case there was an exclusion from the practice of the law. In the Pierce case there was an exclusion from recourse to the courts. And in all of the cases there had been no judicial trial. Again, in all of the cases the Supreme Court of the United States held that the statutes under which both the State and the Federal officers had acted were bills of attainder and, therefore, unconstitutional.

There is also the case of Yung Sing Hee, which is enlightening because it quotes Mr. Justice Story, one of the greatest legal authorities of all time. That case is found in Thirty-sixth Federal Reporter, page 437 (1888). Yung Sing Hee was the daughter of Chinese parents, who was born in the United States. She went out of the country, and when she tried to return she was prevented because of the Chinese exclusion acts. The Court permitted her to enter.

"Bills of this sort", says Mr. Justice Story, "have been most usually passed in England in times of rebellion or gross subserviency to the Crown or of violent political excitements, periods in which all nations are most liable (as well the free as the enslaved) to forget their duties and to trample upon the rights and liberties of others" (Comm., sec. 1344).

The most recent case is that of Johannesen v. United States (225 U.S. 227 (1912)). Johannesen was a Norwegian, who obtained a naturalization certificate by a false statement that he had been a resident of the United States for over 5 years at the time of his application. Many years later it developed that he had been a resident for only 4 years. The Court held that the certificate could be canceled for this fraud. But see language on page 242:

"But if after fair hearing it is judicially determined that by wrongful conduct he has obtained a title to citizenship, the act provides that he shall be deprived of a privilege that was never rightfully his."

Perhaps the most illuminating case to show the attitude of the Supreme Court of the United States is that of Garfield v. Goldsby (211 U.S. 249), decided in 1908. Goldsby was a Chickasaw Indian, and his name was on the list of those entitled to allotment and distribution of land, under an act of Congress giving the Secretary of the Interior the right to make up such a list. Later the Secretary struck Goldsby's name from the list. The Court says (p. 262):

"But, as has been affirmed by this Court in former decisions, there is no place in our constitutional system for the exercise of arbitrary power, and if the Secretary has exceeded the authority conferred upon him by law, then there is power in the courts to restore the status of the parties aggrieved by such unwarranted action.

"In the extended discussion which has been had upon the meaning and extent of constitutional protection against action without due process of law, it has always been recognized that one who has acquired rights by an administrative or judicial proceeding cannot be deprived of them without notice and an opportunity to be heard.

"The right to be heard before property is taken or rights or privileges withdrawn, which have been previously legally awarded, is of the essence of due process of law. It is unnecessary to recite the decisions in which this principle has been repeatedly recognized. It is enough to say that its binding obligation has never been questioned in this Court."

Bills of attainder were used in medieval times. Henry VIII was a particular offender, because he had a Parliament which was entirely subservient to his desires. But they have had no place whatever in the law of any modern nation and practically none in the American system.

In the light of these many quoted cases, therefore, it seems obvious to me that the Supreme Court of the United States will declare that section 3950 of the Revised Statutes, containing a disqualification from bidding as its penalty, is a bill of attainder unless there has been a judicial determination of the commission of the offense charged.

Mr. AUSTIN. Many cases will be found in the brief to support the assertion which I have made, that that ancient statute, if it ever were allowed to have the significance claimed for it in debate here by the Senator from Alabama, would be absolutely void, because it constitutes a bill of attainder, a statute which carries severe penalties, and puts a stigma for life upon a man. It would be a bill of attainder, I say, if it were enforced, as claimed by an officer who is not a judicial trier of questions of fact and judicial trier of charged offenses.

Mr. President, I realize that the atmosphere is such that it is difficult today for us to recur to fundamental principles. It is difficult today for us to adhere firmly to justice. That is why I take the trouble to put into the record of the debate on this measure an ancient decision of one of the greatest jurists the country ever knew, a man whose decisions have meant more to the forming and shaping of our civilization on this side of the Atlantic than any other act or declaration of a statesman in any branch of the Government. I refer to the judicial decisions and opinions of Chief Justice Marshall.

During the discussion of the learned Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] he undertook to justify the Postmaster General's cancelation of the air-mail contracts by claiming there was the power to cancel anyway. I thought that had been assumed somewhat in all our consideration of the matter heretofore; but since he saw fit to debate it as he did and since he did not refer to the case I have in mind, I invite attention to the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States, early in the history of our country and when the Constitution was vividly before the Court, determined that a government may not cancel its contracts for its own wrongs; that a government may not cancel its contract at all save by the means which are provided in the contract itself, and if no such provision is in the contract, but there be a statute, as there is in this case, save by the statute.

This ancient case is found in Tenth United States Reports, page 87, being the case of Fletcher against Peck. It involved collusion. The charge was that the Legislature of the State of Georgia had been bribed into the passage of a certain act. I read from page 128 of the opinion as follows:

> The second count assigns, in substance, as a breach of this covenant, that the original grantees from the State of Georgia promised and assured divers members of the legislature, then sitting in general assembly, that if the said members would assent to, and vote for the passing of the act, and if the said bill should pass, such members should have a share of, and be interested in all the lands purchased from the said State by virtue of such law. And that divers of the said members to whom the said promises were made were unduly influenced thereby, and under such influence did vote for the passing of the said bill; by reason whereof the said law was a nullity—

And so forth. I suggest to the minds of Senators that there is a clear allegation, at least, of fraud.

On page 130 appears the following:

> The fourth covenant in the deed is that the title to the premises has been in no way constitutionally or legally impaired by virtue of any subsequent act of any subsequent legislature of the State of Georgia. The third count recites the undue means practiced on certain members of the legislature, as stated in the second count, and then alleges that, in consequence of these practices, and of other causes, a subsequent legislature passed an act annulling—> annulling and rescinding the law under which the conveyance to the original grantees was made, declaring that conveyance void, and asserting the title of the State to the lands it contained.

Notice the word "annulling"—

> The count proceeds to recite at large this rescinding act and concludes with averring that, by reason of this act, the title of the said Peck in the premise was constitutionally and legally impaired and rendered null and void.

On page 132 the learned Chief Justice proceeded:

> The Legislature of Georgia was a party to this transaction; and for a party to pronounce its own deed invalid, whatever cause may be assigned for its invalidity, must be considered as a mere act of power, which must find its vindication in a train of reasoning not often heard in courts of justice.

I beg the Senate to take notice of those words, "a mere act of power."

> But the real party, it is said, are the people, and when their agents are unfaithful, the acts of those agents cease to be obligatory. It is, however, to be recollected, that the people can act only by these agents, and that, while within the powers conferred upon them, their acts must be considered as the acts of the people. If the agents be corrupt, others may be chosen, and, if their contracts be examinable, the common sentiment, as well as common usage of mankind, points out a mode by which this examination may be made and their validity determined.

I read only the concluding sentence of the next paragraph:

> The question was, in its nature, a question of title, and the tribunal which decided it was either acting in the character of a court of justice, and performing a duty usually assigned to a court, or it was exerting a mere act of power in which it was controlled only by its will.

Thus held the learned Chief Justice. I hold that this is a fundamental principle which affects the issue before us today, for if we proceed to adopt any other of the proposals which are before the Senate than those which restore the status quo and provide for a judicial method or a compliance with the statute with respect to cancelation, then we have said to the rest of the world that the Congress of the United States has departed from the Constitution; that the Congress subscribes to the bill of attainder; that the Congress approves, ratifies, and consummates the arbitrary and tyrannical act of an officer of the United States as an act of power.

> If the legislature felt itself absolved from those rules of property which are common to all the citizens of the United States, and from those principles of equity which are acknowledged in all our courts, its act is supported by its power alone, and the same power may divest any other individual of his lands, if it shall be the will of the legislature so to exert it.
> It is not intended to speak with disrespect of the Legislature of Georgia, or of its acts. Far from it. The question is a general question, and is treated as one. For although such powerful objections to a legislative grant, as are alleged against this, may not again exist, yet the principle, on which alone this rescinding act is to be supported, may be applied to every case to which it shall be the will of any legislature to apply it. The principle is this: That a legislature may, by its own act, divest the vested estate of any man whatever, for reasons which shall, by itself, be deemed sufficient.

The effort here is to put the brakes on any such wild procedure by the Congress of the United States as the ratification of an act of sheer power by a Cabinet officer in exercising judicial functions of annulment under a statute which the Department officials pretend gives them such authority and power, but which obviously does not contain a single word investing them with that extraordinary, that unconstitutional power.

We heard also in the debate the statement that the companies whose contracts were canceled had a hearing. I think it is adequate to meet that claim to point out that in the meeting of May 19, 1930, which is alleged to have been a collusive meeting, Western Air Express was represented by Russell and Bishop, Hanshue and Woolley, and its contract was canceled February 9, 1934. Not one of those witnesses was called before that date.

Mayo, of Stout Air Lines, and Patterson, of Stout Air Lines, were present. Maddux, Cuthell, Furlow, and Sheaffer represented T.A.T. and Maddux Air Lines. Maddux, Cuthell, and Furlow have never been called. Sheaffer came before us January 10, but it was not a hearing upon the merits of cancelation. In fact, as will be seen, it was a month before cancelation occurred.

Aviation Corporation of Delaware was represented at that meeting by Coburn and Hinshaw. Hinshaw was before our committee but not until after he had gone out of Aviation Corporation of Delaware, and had no longer any interest in it. No one appeared before our committee representing Aviation Corporation of Delaware.

Then there was Wheat, of United Aircraft, and Johnson, of United Aircraft, and they were never called. When I say they were not called I mean to say that United Aircraft Corporation never had any man before our committee at all.

Eastern Air Transport was represented at that meeting by Doe and Elliott, but were they called? Not at all; and no other person was called to represent them before our committee.

It will be noticed that I am assuming that the debate implied that appearance before our committee represented a hearing. To be sure, I do not so regard it; but that is giving our opponents the most considerate application of their claims.

Pittsburgh Aviation Industries was represented at the meeting by Robinson and Hann. It was represented before us by no one—not by them.

United States Air Transport was represented at the meeting by Van Zandt and Lou Holland, who were not called before us, and this company was never represented before us.

That is not the end of the story. Of course, there are facts which cannot be controverted and which utterly dispute the assertion made here in debate.

Let me call attention, however, to the following telegram sent to President Franklin D. Roosevelt and Postmaster General James A. Farley at 4:45 p.m. February 9, 1934:

> Press reports are that you are considering canceling all air-mail contracts. We have prepared and will submit to you tomorrow (Saturday) morning, memorandum setting forth our position in this matter, which has not been heard at all so far. We believe that this statement completely refutes every essential charge made to the Senate committee. We ask you as a simple matter of fair play not to take any action with respect to this vitally important matter until you have heard our side of the controversy.
> TRANCONTINENTAL & WESTERN AIR, INC.,
> RICHARD W. ROBBINS, President.

Did they get a hearing? Not at all. They followed that by correspondence begging for a hearing, repeatedly asking for a hearing. That is the great transcontinental line that runs from New York to Los Angeles, right through the heart of the United States, the mid-transcontinental route.

Here is the one that runs from New York to Oakland, United Air Lines. This communication is dated February 16.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator on the amendment has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. I will proceed on the bill.

This communication is dated February 16, 3 days before cancelation was to become effective. These people set up enough to warm a heart of stone, but it had no effect; and yet all in the world they were asking for was a chance to be heard. I read from the concluding paragraph:

> The undersigned call your attention to the evident misinformation upon which your letter is based—> in the confident expectation that you will reexamine the facts and give the undersigned an opportunity to be heard, to the end that grave injustice shall not be suffered by the undersigned, who have in the best of good faith entered into contract obligations with the United States Government, have fully and faithfully complied with all the laws and regulations, and have, in cooperation with the Post Office Department, created one of the greatest air-transport systems in the world.

> BOEING AIR TRANSPORT, INC.
> NATIONAL AIR TRANSPORT, INC.
> PACIFIC AIR TRANSPORT.
> VARNEY AIR LINES, INC.,
> By UNITED AIR LINES, INC.,
> T. G. JOHNSON, President.

Did they get a hearing? They did not.

Not only did we hear the assertion about a hearing being accorded, but we heard these men charged with cowardice for not going into the Court of Claims to present a claim for damages. I think it takes temerity to make a claim of that kind in a debate on the floor of the Senate. In the first place, why should they go into a Court of Claims when we are here at work on permanent legislation, and a resolution is pending to restore their contracts to them? Why should they go into the Court of Claims to try to recover damages in money before they know what those damages will be, or have any measure or yardstick whatever for them? How do they know that within 6 months we may not have an administration that is willing and great enough to recognize a mistake it has made and to correct it? Is it not more wise, is it not more patriotic for them to assume that their Government means to be just, and that the carriage of the mails will be restored to them? Their contracts cannot be restored to them, because they possess them at this moment, as they ever have possessed them. No such act of our Government can destroy the legal efficacy of the contracts.

The contracts are a living force and a binding obligation this instant. All under the heavens that our Government can do is honorably and magnanimously to say, "We know we made a mistake. We will restore the mail under these contracts."

All the Government officials have done is to breach the contracts, to take the mail away from the contractors. The contracts are valid. The contracts are good.

It is said that the contractors have not gone into court because they are cowards. We have seen these honorable men charged with all kinds of chicanery and smutted up here by a speech on the floor of the Senate, and now we find them charged with cowardice; whereas they have gone into the only tribunal that has jurisdiction to give them an adequate remedy, and that is a court of equity, and asked for an injunction. Those whose names I have read have done that in the District of Columbia, and those whose names I previously read went into a court in the State of New York and asked for this relief; and then what happened?

I have too much regard for the dignity and the honor and the glory of my country to charge it with cowardice; but I will say that a certain official took advantage of sovereignty and hid behind sovereignty in order not to have to face the charge of a misuse and abuse of power and a breach of law, and got out of court on a motion to dismiss on the ground of sovereignty!

So let us hear no more about these charges of cowardice, and let us hear no more of the assertion in debate that these parties have had any hearing at all. The officials of the Department never intended to give them a hearing. I have read their request in writing for a hearing.

Mr. President, it was never intended to give them a hearing, and they were never accorded a hearing. Let me read to the Senate the sworn testimony of Postmaster General Farley, recorded in part 6, page 2729, on the question of the hearing. This was on February 24, 1934:

> Senator AUSTIN. Now, do you intend to take the testimony of these operators who have not testified yet?
> Postmaster General FARLEY. To be perfectly frank with you, we have not reached that decision.

Yet this is the same person who, as Postmaster General, had once before held a view that was like our view. When he came before our committee on January 30, this man had not had that thing done to him which caused him to make these cancelations. He had not had that change and transformation in his attitude toward American Government which occurred between January 30 and February 6.

On January 30, just 6 days before he went to the President with a proposition to cancel these contracts, this same Postmaster General took an attitude which would cause every Senator, if he followed him, to support the proposal of the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine and myself, namely, to restore the status quo. Hear his answer, hear his sworn statement, made January 30. I read from page 2037:

> Senator WHITE. And your policy generally has been to continue what I will call the status quo until the completion of the investigation?
> Postmaster General FARLEY. Positively, because, to be frank with you, we do not want to be unfair to any contractor; we want to be fair to all; and we have no right to assume the contracts are not right until an investigation proves otherwise.

Between January 30 and February 6 did this investigation bring out one word of testimony which tended to show any fraud or collusion, or that the contracts were not right? No; not at all. The testimony between those two dates did not relate to the contracts at all. My colleague, the Senator from Maine, and I have examined into that, and we have the material prepared, but I cannot now take the time to put it into the RECORD to show that nothing in the investigation took place between January 30 and February 6 upon which the Postmaster General could justify a complete change in his attitude toward American institutions and American principles, and regard for the rights of citizens, such as occurred, causing him ruthlessly to break these contracts.

Mr. President, I had supposed that the burning-of-the-letters stuff had gone up in smoke entirely, but we had to have it on the Senate floor again. I am going to answer that in the briefest manner possible by saying that there were three duplicates of every letter written in the Postmaster General's Department, two of which were known by our committee to be available. Not only that, but Postmaster General Farley himself knew about those copies, and he maintained and continued the same practice which the former Postmaster General had followed, by providing three copies himself, and having them filed in the same manner followed by the former Postmaster General.

Listen to the testimony of Postmaster General Farley under oath. I read from page 2027:

Senator AUSTIN. And all others would be removed or disposed of, would they?

Postmaster General FARLEY. I assume that I would have the right to remove them.

He was talking about personal letters. Of course, they were removed and burned.

Mr. FARLEY. I assume that I would have the right to remove them; but, in the light of events, be assured before I remove any paper, I would have it properly looked over to be sure nothing was destroyed that would be official.

Senator AUSTIN. Have you any knowledge about what the practice of former Postmasters General has been in the matter of cleaning the files of personal matter?

Mr. FARLEY. No knowledge whatsoever.

Senator AUSTIN. What, if anything, do you know regarding the system which obtains now in your office with reference to the making of more than one carbon or duplicate original of all correspondence?

Mr. FARLEY. All official letters now have three carbon copies.

Senator AUSTIN. And what disposal is made of those three copies?

Mr. FARLEY. Now to be very frank with you——

Senators will notice that he was frank with us—

I can't answer that positively, because my secretary takes my correspondence, and I assume they take the regular course in the files.

Senator AUSTIN. You make the assumption, I gather, that there has been a course of procedure heretofore which they will follow now?

Mr. FARLEY. Yes, sir.

Senator AUSTIN. And so far as you know, there has been no fundamental change in the practice regarding filing in the office of the Postmaster General?

Mr. FARLEY. That is true. Of course, you can understand I would not be familiar with the details.

That was the testimony of Postmaster General Farley. Yet they continue to make the claim of the destruction of official papers by fire, knowing all the time that there were two extra copies available before the event happened of which I now speak.

Postmaster General Brown discovered, in a box the contents of which he had never seen, either when they were put in or afterwards, until the day the box was opened, the very letters which they charged had been burned up, showing that the charge was false, as some other things which have been presented to the Senate are. They were never burned at all, because there they were. They had the two other copies all the time. Now they had the third copy. Yet they come before the Senate and talk about burning letters. The people of the country ought to know, if they have not found out already, when an effort is made to fool and hoodwink them.

They used the correspondence of this man Cuthell. I call attention to part 7, page 3005, of the hearings. It was undertaken to support the claim that those meetings were unlawful by reading from Mr. Cuthell's correspondence.

What was this lawyer's opinion, in fact, about the meetings at the time they were held? Here is the testimony of Colonel Henderson, on page 3005. Understand, this was the very day of the meeting:

Colonel HENDERSON. I called Mr. Cuthell into the corridor and told him that I believed this meeting was an improper one and we should adjourn it, at least until we learned something more about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you tell him why you thought it was improper?

Colonel HENDERSON. No.

The CHAIRMAN. What did he say about it?

Colonel HENDERSON. He said:

"I quite agree with you; if we were holding this meeting across the street in the Raleigh Hotel, it would be an improper meeting; but, because we are holding it at the invitation of a member of the Cabinet and in the office of the Post Office Department, it is perfectly all right."

The CHAIRMAN. Did you discuss anything with any of them that day in connection with the illegality of the purposes of the meeting as you understood it?

Colonel HENDERSON. I did not consider that the meeting was illegal. I thought it was improper.

That was all there was to that. Here was the McNary-Watres Act, an entirely new plan for revamping the air-mail map of the United States. Of course, if the contractors had met at the Raleigh Hotel, without any authority of law, and made an agreement, or attempted to make an agreement, that would have been regarded a cause for not allowing them to bid. But they met at the invitation of the Postmaster General, under section 7 of the McNary-Watres Act, and Cuthell and Henderson both regarded it as legal, but Henderson regarded it as improper. Cuthell said it was all right. So that is what has become of this witness Cuthell.

Now, I want to answer for a moment the claim that men were kept from bidding; that there was some collusion or some agreement that kept men from bidding.

Mr. President, has it occurred to Senators that in all the 2-day debate there was not mentioned the name of a single company which had desired to bid, which was qualified to bid, and which was not permitted to bid? Would it not have been the suitable way to present such a claim, if there were any foundation for it at all, to say, "There was a company over there which wanted to bid, but they would not let it bid. They connived against it, they browbeat it", or they did something about it by which it was prevented from bidding? But no!

In this great case, this cause célèbre, when that is made the sole condition upon which the cancelation occurred—because it is all based on the section relating to bidding—the Senate is asked to pass judgment without a single company being pointed out that was excluded from bidding. The nearest approach to it was the claim that Halliburton was paid $1,400,000 not to bid. The truth is, the record shows, that Halliburton did bid, and that he sold out for that high sum because he was able to get a contract on his bid.

I desire to refer to Halliburton's testimony for just a moment, part 4, page 1488:

The CHAIRMAN. Did you have another one that you did have a mail contract?

Mr. HALLIBURTON. Well, I was a bidder on the southern transcontinental route, from Atlanta to Los Angeles, but had previously agreed to sell my interest in the line in the event the contract was awarded.

That is what Halliburton said about it. Again, on page 1497—bear in mind that Halliburton was not a witness friendly to Postmaster General Brown—the following occurred:

The CHAIRMAN. Then, as a part of that understanding and agreement, did you make a bid in combination with anyone else for one of those routes?

Mr. HALLIBURTON. Yes.

I read the testimony of Halliburton again at page 1498. I read this particular part of the record to show that there was competition; that is, there was competition of a certain kind. It was limited to a number of companies, but it was limited by the law and by the economics of the situation.

Mr. HALLIBURTON. I would not have known what Mr. MacCracken was doing. I know that the Aviation Corporation officials had prepared another bid or two with a view of bidding on the central route in the event that T.A.T. and Western Air should bid on the southern route, or anyone should bid on it, and they were all protecting themselves with bids, and, of course, bids were put in right at the moment when they were to be opened, and, of course, apparently each fellow was watching the other one.

If that is not a picture of competition between those big fellows, I do not know what is. They had up their sleeves extra bids all the time, watching closely so that they might put in an alternative bid if necessary in order to meet the competition, if they found that the man who was trying to obtain the midtranscontinental route also bid on the southern route, or if they found that the man who was trying to get the southern route also bid on the midtranscontinental route.

That, however, is not all. Here is the testimony of Mr. Sheaffer, who has been alluded to, at page 1534:

Mr. SHEAFFER. It was pretty well understood that there would be one company operate that line if it got a contract—if the Transcontinental Air Transport and the Western Air got the contract.

The CHAIRMAN. Was it not understood that you would get the contract if you consolidated according to his ideas, and the consolidation met with his approval?

Mr. SHEAFFER. No, sir; I would not say it was so understood, because we understood it had to be advertised in accordance with the statute and we had to bid.

The CHAIRMAN. And you did not understand that you were to get the contract?

Mr. SHEAFFER. No, sir; we did not understand that we were positively going to get the contract.

The CHAIRMAN. You understood you were to have a considerable edge on it, didn't you?

Mr. SHEAFFER. No, sir; we had to bid the same as anybody else.

The CHAIRMAN. Whom were you going to bid against?

Mr. SHEAFFER. It might be anybody who wanted to bid. The bids were advertised in accordance with the Post Office formulas and the statute under the Watres Act.

Again, at page 1660, the same witness, Mr. Sheaffer, said:

This morning Mr. Coburn made a statement that there was an agreement between the air lines that there would not be bidding, they would not bid on other routes, or any route other than the routes that they were operating on at that time, and I wish on the part of T.A.T. to deny that we had any such agreement with any air lines and specifically that we had no such agreement with United Aircraft, which, as you will notice on the map, flew down to Kansas City, flew from Los Angeles to San Francisco, and that there was a very important line to their general situation from Los Angeles to Kansas City, as well as the line from New York to Pittsburgh and Chicago via one of the most densely populated territories served.

Further than that, you have specifically the Northwest Airway, who were certainly in the field and available to bid on any advertised bid.

Later, on page 1661, he says:

The CHAIRMAN. And there was no agreement that they would not bid?

Mr. SHEAFFER. No, sir.

He contrasts the situation then with that at the time of the meeting in this manner, at page 1662:

Mr. SHEAFFER. We had no understanding with them not to bid.

The CHAIRMAN. You are testifying under oath that you have no idea why they did not bid?

Mr. SHEAFFER. I have no idea except that they were not interested.

Later in Mr. Sheaffer's testimony the following occurred:

The CHAIRMAN. What was the object of these conferences?

Going back, it will be seen, to May. That was one of the confusing performances designed to get the witness into trouble, and designed to fool the public.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the object of these conferences, Mr. Sheaffer, if they were not to arrange which companies should get which lines?

Mr. SHEAFFER. As I have previously testified, Mr. Chairman, those conferences were before the decision made by the Comptroller General with regard to extensions; and when the bidding of the two central transcontinentals, the advertisements for bids, come out, it put an entirely different picture on the whole situation.

I now wish to refer to the testimony of Mr. Coburn, one of the witnesses, at page 1671. He is the witness just referred to by Mr. Sheaffer:

Mr. COBURN. Listening to the testimony of the preceding witness, it occurs to me that I ought to clarify a statement that I made this morning. It will be recalled that I said there had been no written agreements among the air-mail operators with respect to bidding on the transcontinentals. I should like to amplify that, because there were no written agreements, no oral agreements, either, in regard to bidding; that is, I did not make any.

The feeling in my mind was this: We had never made any formal agreements. I think that everybody knew that my company was going to bid on the southern transcontinental, and it was common knowledge amongst all of us that T.A.T. and Western Air would bid on the middle one. I am quite sure that I did not fear that the United would come down there and bid for the southern transcontinental, because the Postmaster General had said that he wanted the three independent competitive lines.

Well, they could not have that and carry out that policy. So far as the other operators were concerned, they were all set somewhere, and for any operator other than Eastern Air to bid for that southern transcontinental would be uneconomical. I mean he would have to come down to some other part of the United States and set up shops, and all that sort of thing.

So that the feeling in my mind was that probably none of the operators, none of the air-mail operators, would bid, and that's all right—I stand by that. I want to make it clear, however, that I had made no agreements, orally or written, personally or on behalf of the corporation.

I quote from the testimony of Mr. Hinshaw, at page 1585:

The CHAIRMAN. What was to be the attitude of those who were bought out with reference to bidding? Were they to agree not to bid?

Mr. HINSHAW. Not to my knowledge; no, sir. I do not think—I do not see how they would ever stipulate that in a contract.

Of course, if we should take these questions of the chairman of our great committee, with their imputations and should assume that each question received an affirmative answer, we would have some evidence to support the claim which is made; but unless we do that, we have nothing, and we have to go right directly against the answer of the witnesses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Vermont on the bill and on the amendment has expired.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, much has been said in the debate about the grounds on which the air-mail contracts were canceled. I desire to have printed as a part of my remarks at this point in the RECORD the opinion of the Solicitor of the Post Office Department, Mr. Karl A. Crowley, as of date February 6, 1934, and upon which the Postmaster General based his action. The opinion deals not only with the facts, but the law, and, in my judgment, sets forth the very essence of the case that the contracts were void, and sets forth likewise the law applicable to the case.

There being no objection, the opinion was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 6, 1934.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL: I was directed by you to make an investigation of air-mail contracts and to attend the hearings held before the special committee of the Senate of the United States to investigate ocean- and air-mail contracts and make a report to you. Investigation has been made over a period of several weeks with the assistance of numerous post-office inspectors and attorneys in this office. The representatives of the Department have attended every hearing of the Senate committee, and an exhaustive study of the facts has been made. These facts have been brought to your attention informally from time to time.

The investigation is continuing, but it is believed that the evidence taken so far shows the general plan of the awarding of the contracts and that a report should be made to you at this time.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

There have been filed with you a statement of facts in two volumes, numbered 1 and 2, containing copies of contracts, other documents and correspondence, statements of officials in the Post Office Department, and a statement of the evidence introduced before the Senate committee investigating air- and ocean-mail contracts.

These two volumes, which have been reviewed by you, contain a detailed statement of the facts with respect to the execution of the present air-mail contracts, and they may be summarized as follows:

Before the McNary-Watres Act was passed on April 29, 1930, certain air-transport operators, who later secured air-mail contracts, and air-mail contractors, organized a powerful lobby for the purpose of passing this bill. The then Postmaster General, Walter F. Brown, was also very much interested in its passage, and he and others lobbying for the bill used their influence to pass it with a provision which would permit the Postmaster General to award air-mail contracts without competitive bidding. This Congress refused to do, after many heated debates upon the subject. They were able, however, to include in the bill a provision which allowed the Postmaster General to extend air-mail routes, when required in the public interest, and so the bill became a law April 30, 1930.

On May 15, 1930, the then air-mail superintendent, Earl B. Wadsworth, directed by the then Second Assistant Postmaster General, W. Irving Glover, who, in turn, was directed by Postmaster General Brown, called a meeting of certain air-mail contractors. The memorandum calling the meeting was in writing, and the purpose of the meeting is clearly stated therein. The memorandum, in part, reads:

"He (Brown) sees the feeling that is developing among the passenger-carrying lines who have no mail contract and have no way of getting into the picture unless it is by competitive bidding, and he wants to have a meeting with these representatives on next Monday, May 19, at 2 p.m., in his office, and desires to have a talk with them along the lines of just the best way for them to approach the question of giving aid to passenger lines. In other words, he wants them to come to some understanding so that it will not all be thrown into the pot and the passenger-line operators left entirely outside due to the fact that the air-mail operators would have the inside and would have the territory covered.

"The companies he desires at this meeting are as follows: United Aircraft Corporation, Aviation Corporation of America, Western Air, T.A.T.-Maddux, Eastern Air Transport, Stout Lines."

The meeting was held at 2 p.m. on May 19, 1930, and representatives of the concerns mentioned above were present by invitation. These companies, it will be noted, now comprise the three great aviation companies of the country—United Aircraft & Transport Corporation, Aviation Corporation of America, and North American Aviation Corporation. In addition to these, the smaller air-mail contractors were represented.

The group was carefully chosen. Only those invited were permitted to remain in the conference. The meeting was opened by the Postmaster General, who desired to know whether it would be possible for the so-called "pioneers" to agree among themselves as to the territory in which they should have paramount interest on the lines of certain prospective routes that were in contemplation, and the best means of awarding these routes and contracts among themselves without competitive bidding.

Col. Paul Henderson, of the United Aircraft & Transport Corporation, thought the group could work out a plan. He seems to have originated the extension idea and mentioned the granting of extensions and then assigning such extensions to some operators who had no air-mail contract, and indicated that the air-mail contractors would be willing to agree to such a plan. Mr. Wheat, of United Aircraft, who had been specially mentioned in the order to call the conference, said, "I feel sure the entire group would be delighted to go into such a conference and work it out along the lines suggested."

Mr. Maddux, of Transcontinental Air Transport, now a part of Transcontinental & Western Air, Inc., of the North American group, said that he would rather see the plan worked out as mentioned above than by competitive bidding, and that this was the view of his company. At the time Mr. George Cuthel, of the same company, suggested a grouping of companies to deal with the southern and midcontinent transcontinental routes.

Mr. Harris Hanshue, of the Western Air Express, now a part of the North American group, said, "We are willing to do anything within reason to work out the plan, rather than to go into competitive bidding."

Mr. Coburn, of the Aviation Corporation of America, is recorded as saying, "I believe there is a community of interests among the operators and the Department, and they are ready to cooperate and find out how to do it."

The minutes show that "the Postmaster General asked everyone to speak if there were any objections to the plan suggested, and said that this was the appropriate time to express their opinions or objections thereto. No one arose in objection to the plan."

Thereupon, so the written records kept by the secretary read: "The Postmaster General decided to permit the operators to use the room in which the meeting was held for the purpose of organizing themselves into such groups as may be decided upon, and to report back to the Postmaster General when they had reached a conclusion with regard to the suggested plan. He suggested that they stick to the routes outlined."

Representatives of all the companies whose contracts have been annulled have testified before the Special Committee of the Senate Investigating Ocean-Mail and Air-Mail Contracts, and admitted having attended the conferences and the result of the conferences. Therefore, up to this point we have the following facts established:

First. That the contracts on air-mail routes 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, were about to expire, and it was necessary to grant temporary extensions for 6 months and route certificates on these air-mail contracts in order to avoid reletting them by competitive bidding. Second, that a conference was held by the representatives of all the air-mail contractors and Post Office officials. Third, that the conferences were held for the purpose of making plans for a division of all air-mail contracts. Fourth, that it was planned upon the suggestion of Col. Paul Henderson, of the United Aircraft & Transport Corporation, that these contracts be awarded to the companies as they had agreed, by extending their routes and thereby avoiding competitive bidding. Fifth, that this plan was agreed to by all the parties who were present, either by their direct statements, or, as stated in the written minutes, "no one arose in objection to the plan."

The record shows that a list of the routes was laid out and each one given a number. Immediately following the number and route was a list of the claimants, this being done in writing and in evidence before the Black committee, which is held open to public sessions.

The conference was continued until June 4, 1930, when Mr. W. P. MacCracken, Jr., who was elected chairman, filed a written report showing how the operators had agreed among themselves on a division of the routes, and said:

"The committee has made a study of 12 routes and has agreed upon recommendations as to 7 of these, while as to the remaining 5 there are still some matters in controversy", and

"The operators interested in the routes under controversy have all agreed to submit the issues to the Postmaster General in the hope that a satisfactory solution may be reached. They request that an opportunity be afforded them to present their claims for consideration on the respective routes, in such manner and at such time as may be designated by the Postmaster General."

It was agreed that not only would the operators be allowed to divide the routes among themselves, but also to fix their rate of pay. It was agreed that the Postmaster General would attempt to ascertain from the Comptroller General just how far he could go in establishing routes by the extension method, particularly with reference to the middle transcontinental route, which it had been agreed should go to a corporation to be formed by a merger of Transcontinental Air Transport and Western Air Express; and the southern transcontinental route, which it had been agreed should go to Amerian Airways. After the claims of the operators were all presented to the Postmaster General, he and the claimants agreed to award every route except the two last-mentioned transcontinental routes, by so-called "extensions" of existing routes. It was then determined that they would have to advertise the middle and southern routes for bids, and the next move of the operators was to devise plans and ways and means to prevent competitive bidding on these two.

After every route had been awarded just as agreed on, without competitive bidding and under the extension method, then the certificate method was used to continue the contracts for a period of 10 years. It must be borne in mind that most of the contracts were about to expire with the 4-year limitation fixed by law when the Watres Act was passed, and a number, in fact, had expired. But under the new act Brown contended that they could be extended for a period not exceeding 10 years by granting of a route certificate. This was simply a fancy name for an extension of a contract.

On the southern transcontinental route and the midcontinent transcontinental route, the two corporations which later received these contracts entered into agreements with themselves and others whereby competition was eliminated. The American Airways entered into a contract with Erle Halliburton, which was in writing and which provided that Halliburton was to receive, and in fact did receive, $1,400,000 for his company and act as the agent of American Airways, owned by Aviation Corporation, in securing this contract. The Transcontinental Air Transport and Western Air Express contributed a part of this money necessary to pay Halliburton, and their contract with American Airways was also in writing. These contracts were all conditioned on the companies, American Airways and Transcontinental and Western Air, securing Post Office air-mail contracts.

The contract was awarded to Halliburton on the southern route at 40 cents per airplane-mile; but notwithstanding the bid of 40 cents, the rate fixed in the contract, when signed, was for the maximum rate of 88 cents for twice the amount of space for carrying mail as was advertised for, or necessary.

There were two bidders on the middle transcontinental route, the consolidated company, called "Transcontinental & Western Air Express" and the Avigation Co. The evidence publicly taken shows that there was a deliberate attempt on the part of Glover, Gove, and Graves, all of the Post Office Department, to award this contract to the highest bidder, notwithstanding any showings that could be made by the lower. MacCracken prepared a set of specifications designed and intended to freeze out all competition, including an illegal provision requiring night-flying experience. The matter was submitted to the Comptroller General, who ruled that illegal restrictions were contained in the advertisement and that the contract should be awarded to the low bidder. After months of correspondence the Comptroller General finally accepted statements of fact made by Postmaster General Brown to the effect that the low bidder was not responsible, which statements were untrue, and permitted the contracts to be awarded to Transcontinental & Western Air. The matter was secretly submitted to John Lord O'Brian, Assistant to the Attorney General, who advised that this award would be illegal and that the bids should be thrown out and the routes readvertised on account of a provision inserted in the contracts requiring night-flying experience, not authorized by law. Nevertheless, the award was made to the higher bidder, and the low bidder, the Avigation Co., was shattered and broken up by promises made to Letson, who was one of the Avigation officials. Letson's company was awarded a contract under the extension method from Kansas City to Denver.

Thus it will be seen that not only was the conference held and plans laid but the plans were carried out in the minutest detail.

We also know that Colonel Henderson, of the United, loaned Chase Gove, the assistant to Glover, $10,000 in cash soon after these conferences; that Gove has never repaid this money and Henderson never expects him to pay it; also that Henderson carried a stock account in the name of the wife of an official in the Department of Commerce, which has control of airports, lighting of airways, etc., and paid her $1,200 as alleged "profits." The record further shows that political influence was used and that some of these contracts were awarded to contractors on the basis of political influence and personal friendship.

What has been said might not apply to Alfred Frank, of the National Parks Airways. Mr. Frank came into the conference but was not given any additional territory. He did later, through the influence and with the assistance of one of the parties, Hainer Hinshaw, secure a route certificate, and his pay was almost doubled by an increase from a sum which would have amounted to approximately $450,000 to a rate where he has been paid approximately $1,100,000 for performing the identical service.

The general statement may not apply to Kohler Aviation Corporation, but its contract was procured as an extension of the route of Northwest Airways, Inc., which had representatives at the conference and certainly benefited therefrom.

It is an undisputed fact that the rate of pay on the contract awarded to Varney Airlines, Inc., on the Pasco-Seattle, Wash., route was greatly increased by a consolidation of routes, this excess being almost $1,000,000; that the space contracted for by American Airways on the southern transcontinental route was never needed, and that as a result of that concern having a contract at the maximum rate for 450 pounds of mail, instead of at the minimum rate of 40 cents, as bid, an overpayment of approximately $2,000,000 has been made by the Government to American Airways; that the Government has paid almost $3,000,000 more to Transcontinental & Western Air Express, Inc., for carrying the mail on the middle transcontinental route than it would have paid to the low bidder; that a saving of at least a thousand dollars a day could have been made by awarding the contract over the routes flown by Eastern Air Transport, Inc., by competitive bidding; that National Parks Airways, Inc., secured a route certificate and received under that certificate about $650,000 more than it would have been paid under its original contract let as a result of competitive bidding; and that about $47,000,000, all told, has been paid for air-mail service and space that was never required nor needed, and amounted to outright donations or contributions arbitrarily made by the then Postmaster General, Walter F. Brown.

It is clear from the evidence that all the so-called "extensions" of routes were made in order to avoid competitive bidding, and that these extensions amounted, in many instances, to distances greater than the original route; also that no route certificates or extensions would have been granted to the companies that received them unless it had been so agreed at the conferences between the operators and Post Office officials, held during the month of May 1930, hereinbefore referred to.

Evidence taken at a hearing before the Senate committee definitely establishes the fact that many Post Office records were burned immediately before March 4, 1933, when the new administration came into office. The contents of about 36 large filing cases were taken from the office of Postmaster General Brown and burned in the basement of the Post Office Building by direction of Postmaster General Brown or his secretary. The contents of 12 large filing cases were burned by direction of the former Second Assistant Postmaster General W. Irving Glover, after he had personally examined the files and torn into small bits certain unidentified letters and documents.

While the evidence was being heard before the Senate committee, William P. MacCracken, Jr., chairman of the spoils conference, and L. H. Brittin, of Northwest Airways, Inc., were subpenaed to appear before the Senate committee and bring their files relating to air-mail contracts. It now develops that these records have also been destroyed in a clear attempt to prevent their being made public.

It is known that many records were made and were in the Post Office Department files at one time. They cannot be found, since the contents of the filing cases were burned. Of course, it is impossible to secure exact information as to what records were burned, but every circumstance indicates that the original opinion of the Assistant Attorney General, John Lord O'Brian, the minutes of the spoils conference, and the original of the MacCracken report dated June 4, 1930, as well as all general correspondence between air-mail operators and post office officials were burned.

The facts which have been considered were obtained from evidence found in written form in the Post Office Department records and by admissions made by the operators themselves, under oath, before the Senate committee. Numerous representatives of all these companies have testified before the committee at public hearings, and the proceedings have been officially reported. These companies have been given every opportunity to explain and justify the high-handed proceedings which I have referred to. They have not done so; but, on the other hand, their representatives freely confessed and admitted their participation in the conspiracy and combination to bring about this situation.

Positive and direct evidence establishes a conspiracy between air-mail contractors and post office officials to defraud the Government of the United States. Even if actual bribery is not proven, the beneficiaries of the conspiracy have admitted using personal and political influences to secure these contracts, extensions, consolidations, and route certificates in a manner that is vicious and fraudulent.

It is not deemed necessary to go further into the facts for the purpose of this opinion.

PROPOSITIONS OF LAW

The following propositions of law have been considered:

Proposition 1

All present air-mail contracts, whether granted by the "extension" method, awarded under advertisement, or by route certificate, and void because they were made as a result of a combination among the persons receiving such contracts (with the exception of the National Parks Airways, Inc., and Kohler Aviation Corporation), and the Postmaster General of the United States in violation of section 3950 of the Revised Statutes.

Proposition 2

All the present air-mail contracts (with the exception of those of the National Parks Airways and Kohler Aviation Corporation) were executed as a result of a fraudulent, corrupt, collusive conspiracy to defraud the United States between the holders thereof and Post Office Department officials, and it is the duty of the Postmaster General, in safeguarding the public interest, to annul all of such contracts promptly on the discovery of the fraud.

Proposition 3

The air-mail contracts on routes nos. 33 and 34 were executed by the former Postmaster General, Walter F. Brown, and the holders thereof as a result of a conspiracy to prevent competitive bidding and as a direct result of collusive agreements made between the holders of such contracts and other prospective bidders therefor, and are void from their inception.

Statement under propositions 1, 2, and 3

Contracts induced by a fraud are voidable by the party to the contract defrauded. It is the duty of the heads of departments of the Government to honestly and fairly administer the law relating to their departments, to safeguard the public interest and welfare, and this duty includes the duty to procure services and supplies used by the Government of the United States by competitive bidding, as provided by law.

There are numberless authorities holding that contracts induced by fraud are voidable by the party to the contract defrauded.

In Pan American Company v. United States, supra, the Supreme Court of the United States said:

"It is clear that, at the instance of Doheny, Fall so favored the making of these contracts and leases that it was impossible for him loyally or faithfully to serve the interests of the United States. The lower courts for that reason rightly held the United States entitled to have them adjudged illegal and void."

In United States v. Pan American Petroleum Company, supra, the court said:

"The safest salutary and correct rule concerning the validity of a public contract made by a governmental officer with a private citizen or concern, where simultaneously and concurrently with negotiations for the public contract the officer clandestinely receives and accepts a substantial amount of money from the person or concern with whom he is negotiating, and who later receives the public contract containing valuable rights to him or to his principal, is to abrogate, annul, and set aside the contract as contra bonos mores and against public policy. This rule should be applied in all such cases, regardless of whether the money transaction is a loan, a gift, or a bribe. In such a situation the whole contract and all official conduct relating thereto are tainted, and it is impossible to say to what extent the contract and official acts were influenced by the concurrent clandestine money transaction."

It was said in Crocker v. United States, supra:

"Of course, the secret arrangement with Machen operated to vitiate the company's contract and justified the Postmaster General in rescinding it on discovering the fraud.

"It results that no recovery could be had upon the contract with the Postmaster General, because it was tainted with fraud and rescinded by him on that ground."

From Tool Co. v. Norris, supra, there is quoted the following:

"All contracts for supplies should be made with those, and with those only, who will execute them most faithfully and at the least expense to the Government. Considerations as to the most efficient and economical mode of meeting the public wants should alone control, in this respect, the action of every department of the Government. No other consideration can lawfully enter into the transaction, so far as the Government is concerned. Such is the rule of public policy, and whatever tends to introduce any other elements into the transaction is against public policy. That agreements, like the one under consideration, have this tendency is manifest. They tend to introduce personal solicitation and personal influence as elements in the procurement of contracts, and thus directly lead to inefficiency in the public service and to unnecessary expenditures of the public funds."

In Michigan Steel Box Co. v. United States, supra, the Court said:

"It has accordingly been held to be against public policy to enforce a contract between two parties where the consideration involved the violation by one party, as agent, of a duty he owed his principal to act for and represent the latter. Oscanyan v. Arms Co. (103 U.S. 261.)

While an agreement to procure such a contract is void as against public policy, equally strong, and perhaps stronger, is the reason in law for saying that if the parties succeed in securing a contract with the Government by virtue of the fraudulent agreement that the agent shall aid in its procurement, and because of the agent's activities under such agreement, the Government on discovering the fraud may annul the contract, and the courts will not aid in enforcing it. In either case the contract comes under the denunciation of that class of frauds which have been declared to be an 'unmixed evil.'"

In Meguire v. Corwine, supra, it was said:

"The law touching contracts like the one here in question has been often considered by this Court and is well settled by our adjudications (Marshall v. Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., 16 How. 314; Tool Company v. Norris, 2 Wall. 45; Trist v. Child, 21 id. 441; Coppell v. Hall, 7 id. 542). It cannot be necessary to go over the same ground again. To do so would be a waste of time. The object of this opinion is, rather, to vindicate the application of our former rulings to this record than to give them new support. They do not need it. Frauds of the class to which the one here disclosed belongs are an unmixed evil. Whether forbidden by a statute or condemned by public policy, the result is the same. No legal right can spring from such a source. They are the sappers and miners of the public welfare, and of free government as well. The latter depends for its vitality upon the virtue and good faith of those for whom it exists and of those by whom it is administered. Corruption is always the forerunner of despotism."

The following is quoted from Garman v. United States, supra:

"This Court has always regarded the Government as somewhat in the character of a ward and its officers in the character of its guardians, and it has never given effect to a contract where it appeared that the contractor had, directly or indirectly, by direct bribes or corrupt influences, sought to impair the good faith of the guardian. The corrupt purchase of political or personal influence is more insidious and in its result as bad as direct bribery."

From United States v. Bentley, supra, the following is quoted:

"It is true the courts have regarded Government officers and agents, when dealing for or with the Government to which their services are due as occupying a position similar to that of a guardian transacting business for or with his ward. Note, for instance, Garman v. United States (34 C.Cls. 237, 242); United States v. Carter (217 U.S. 286, 306, et seq.; 69 Sup. Ct. 515; 54 L.Ed. 769; 19 Ann. Cas. 594); City of Findlay v. Pertz (66 Fed. 427, 435; 13 C.C.A. 559; 29 L.R.A. 188 (C.C.A. 6)); Crocker v. United States (240 U.S. 74, 78, et seq.; 36 Sup. Ct. 245; 60 L.Ed. 533). It is also true that persons dealing with Government officers and agents, whether such officers or agents represent a municipal, a State, or the National Government, are in duty bound to inquire as to and to take notice of the extent of such officers' and agents' authority and power, and are to be held to a recognition that such officers and agents must observe fairness and good faith as between themselves and the Government, and may not be swayed to the prejudice of the interests of their cestui que trust. Both are expected to exercise honest and common sense. Wentworth v. United States (5 C.Cls. 302); Livingston v. United States (3 C.Cls. 131)."

Trist v. Child, supra, contained the following pronouncement:

"In the Roman law it was declared that 'a promise made to effect a base purpose, as to commit homicide or sacrilege, is not binding.' In our jurisprudence a contract may be illegal and void because it is contrary to a constitution or statute, or inconsistent with sound policy and good morals. Lord Mansfield said: 'Many contracts which are not against morality are still void as being against the maxims of sound policy.'"

From Hume v. United States, supra, the following is quoted:

"In order to guard the public against losses and injuries arising from the fraud or mistake or rashness or indiscretion of their agents, the rule requires of all persons dealing with public officers the duty of inquiry as to their power and authority to bind the Government; and persons so dealing must necessarily be held to a recognition of the fact that Government agents are bound to fairness and good faith as between themselves and their principal. Whiteside v. United States (93 U.S. 247, 257); United States v. Barlow, ante, 271."

Generally speaking, a State has no more right than an individual to avoid a contract. But it has been clearly established that a State may repudiate a contract which was fraudulently procured (59 C.J. 186, s. 322). In the case of People v. Stephens, 71 N.Y. 527 (1878), an action was brought by the State to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the people in consequence of a fraudulent combination and conspiracy between defendants to prevent competition and to deceive the contracting board in letting repair contracts for certain sections of the State canals, and to induce, and which did induce, the letting of the contracts at excessive prices. The State then sought to recover damages, but after it had waived the fraud and required the contractors to complete the contract. Although the State was nonsuited, the court repeatedly declared that the State had the right to rescind all of the contracts because of the fraud, and, in fact, a number of the contracts were rescinded. Thus the court, page 546, declares:

"The general rules condemning as unlawful combinations to prevent bidding at auction sales have with good reason been applied to offers to the Government of services or property in response to a call for proposals, with a view to contract with the lowest bidder * * *. The bargain and combination of the contractors * * * by which the privilege of bidding for the work upon a particular contract secured sections to one individual without competition, were against public policy and illegal, and * * * authorized a rejection of the proposal and a repudiation of the contract * * *."

A case particularly in point (State v. Cross, 17 Pac. 190 (Kans. 1888)) sustains the principle that the State may repudiate a contract induced by fraud. In this case the defendant obtained, by bribery of those having control over such contracts, a contract with the State for the purchase of lands of the State normal school. The court states, page 192:

"A contract to induce public officers to act corruptly, or to bias them in discharge of their official duties, is against public policy; and such a contract is void. 'It would be going but half the distance required for public security if the courts would but simply deny the aid of their machinery to the corrupt participants. A contract obtained by bribery of those having control over such contracts is obtained by fraud upon the principal; and it behooves the court to leave the briber where he stands, and deny him any benefit from the contract. It is immaterial how small or trifling the bribe was, as compared with the amount involved in the contract. Principle accommodates itself only to motives of parties, not to the sum gained by corrupt action.' (Greenh. Pub. Pol. 308, 309.) In Lindsey v. City of Philadelphia (2 Phila. 212) Sharswood, J., said: 'It is important that corrupt contracts with public officers should be sternly repudiated by courts of justice, and that men should understand that in assenting to an allowance to such an officer of part of what they may have a claim for on the public treasury—be that allowance small or great—they absolutely forfeit all their legal rights on the public.'"

In Dement v. Rokker (19 N.E. 33 (Ill. 1888)) a contract was let to a firm formed for the purpose of preventing bidding on a public-printing contract, some of whose members had been paid by the others for refraining from bidding individually. Under the constitution of the State it was provided that contracts of this nature must be let to the lowest responsible bidder, and although the court did not refer to the fraud involved it was held that such a conspiracy to prevent competitive bidding made the letting of the contract in question void.

In the case of Garman v. United States (34 C.Cls. 237), where a mail contractor brought suit for a month's extra pay for expedited services "dispensed with", and it appearing by the claimant's affidavit made in a criminal case that he paid a large sum of money to a Government official to secure the expedited service, it was held that the act of the contractor in thus procuring the expedited service rendered it contra bonos mores and against public policy, and he cannot recover extra pay.

The right to declare contracts void which were induced by fraud may also be exercised by municipal corporations. Thus, in Honaker v. Board of Education of Pocatelico District (24 S.E. 544 (W.Va. 1896)) a certain company, through its agents, offered to members of the board of education money and other things of value, and used various other undue, illegal, and fraudulent inducements, with the view of securing an order and contract for the purchase of certain school supplies, and injunction proceedings were instituted by taxpayers to enjoin the board of education from paying for said supplies and the injunction was granted. The court, page 546, held:

"Every public officer being a guardian of the public welfare, no transaction growing out of his official services or position can be allowed to inure to his personal benefit; and from such transactions the law will not imply a contract (Davis v. U.S., 23 C.Cls. 329). When a contract grows out of and is connected with an illegal act, it will not be enforced (Jones v. Surprise, 64 N.H. 243, 9 Atl. 384). Courts of justice will not enforce any contract which is injurious to public rights, contravenes public policy, or violates public law. A contract with the State, procured by bribery upon the officers having power to make it, is against public policy and void (State v. Cross, 38 Kans. 696, 17 Pac. 190)."

See also City of Findlay v. Pertz, 66 Fed. 427 (Ohio 1895), where a city rescinded a sale to it because a commission was paid to its officer for bringing about the sale. These cases are in accord with the principle that a contract made by a public officer is against public policy and void if it interferes with the unbiased discharge of his duty to the public in the exercise of his office, or if it places him in a position inconsistent with his duty to the public, or even if it has a tendency to induce him to violate such duty (Spence v. Harvey, 22 Cal. 336; Cheney v. Unroe, 77 N.E. 1041).

The courts go even further and hold, by the overwhelming weight of authority, that contracts or agreements, without regard to their form, made for the purpose of preventing free and fair competition, or of stifling or chilling biddings at public sales, or in the letting of contracts by the Government, or for the purpose of giving undue advantage to either of the parties thus engaged in dealing with reference to the bidding, are contrary to public policy and void (King v. Winants, 71 N.C. 469; Capital Gas Co. v. Young, 41 Pac. 869; San Diego v. San Diego & L. A. R. Co., 44 Cal. 106; Shakespear v. Smith, 77 Cal. 638; Nuckols v. Lyle, 70 Pac. 401; Drake v. Lauer, 75 N.E. 1129; Cole v. Brown-Hurley Hardware Co., 117 N.W. 746; Davis v. Bolon, 177 Pac. 903; and Holcomb v. Summit, 15 S.W. (2d) 362; 46 C.J. 1037, sec. 308).

All air-mail contracts made by the so-called "extension method", whereby one extension after another was tacked on existing routes so as to build up great systems, are void because such contracts were not awarded by competitive bidding, as provided by law.

Statement under proposition 4

The evidence taken at the public hearings before the Senate committee and from Post Office records clearly shows that former Postmaster General Brown and the air-mail contractors very carefully laid their plans to award the favored companies air-mail contracts by extending their routes from some point to the point desired to be reached by the extension, regardless of distance. This was admittedly done for the purpose of evading the statutes, which require competitive bidding. To illustrate, an air-mail route was built up from St. Louis to New Orleans by extensions which were made at right angles from existing routes held by American Airways; and the route of Northwest Airways was built up by extensions so as to make it considerably longer than the original route. In another case the American Airways secured a route from Louisville, Ky., to Fort Worth, Tex., a distance of several hundred miles, by extensions. The St. Louis-New Orleans route was always considered a separate route, and is now operated separately and not as a part of the routes which were extended. At the very time these extensions were made a responsible concern was endeavoring to secure a contract over the route by bidding, but was unable to persuade Brown to advertise the route.

There are two general branches of the laws requiring advertising: The first apply to supply contracts of the United States and the second to mail-carrying contracts.

SUPPLY CONTRACTS

41 U.S.C. 5 (3709 R.S., as amended) requires that:

"* * * all purchases and contracts for supplies or services in any of the departments of the Government * * * shall be made by advertising * * *."

Certain exceptions to the provisions of 41 U.S.C. 5 have been contained in legislation enacted since the promulgation of that statute, and these exceptions are set forth in collective form in 41 U.S.C. 6. Under the provisions of 41 U.S.C. 7, authority was vested in the Secretary of the Treasury to contract, after proper advertisement, for certain miscellaneous supplies set forth in that section. The amendments to the original act did not modify the requirement that all purchases or contracts be advertised except in case of public exigency: their purpose being merely to provide a mode for carrying this requirement into effect (22 A.G. 1). The purpose of the law has been stated to be "* * * a wise public policy insuring to the Government the advantage of competition in making contracts for supplies" (22 A.G. 1).

It was held in 13 A.G. 174 that a contract which the law only allows to be made in pursuance of an advertisement may not be renewed and extended at the pleasure of the Postmaster General without advertisement, as such action would defeat the purpose of the law requiring public competition. This view was upheld in 21 A.G. 209.

It was held in 15 A.G. 538 that an extension of a contract given without advertising by the Commissioner of Patents was not obligatory upon the Government. In that case the Attorney General said:

"In ordinary cases, where an agent has made a contract in excess of his powers, no doubt if the principal stand by and see the contractor in good faith incur expense to enable him to perform his engagements, such principal cannot avoid the consequences of his silence by pleading that the agent had no power to make such a contract. In many cases such conduct would amount to a ratification.

"But I think it is misconception of this well-known principle to suggest that where, as in the present case, a public statute requires officers who make contracts for the Government to do so in a way calculated 'to prevent favoritism and to give to the United States the benefit of competition' (Attorney General Berrien, 2 Opin., 259), if such officer fails to adopt such course, he, or some other officer of the United States (the latter being as much a mere agent of the principal as the former), by permitting the contractor to make expenditures in the course of his engagements, can render that contract binding upon the United States which otherwise would not be so."

American Smelting & Refining Co. v. United States, 259 U.S. 75, holds that the provisions of 41 U.S.C. 5 are for the protection of the Government and not the private party to the contract.

It is provided in 39 U.S.C. 803 that no contract for supplies shall be made with any person who has entered, or proposed to enter, into a combination to prevent the making of a bid for furnishing such supplies or to fix a price or prices therefor; also that if any person so combining, etc., is already a contractor, his contract may be annulled.

MAIL-CARRYING CONTRACTS

The requirement that general mail lettings be advertised is contained in 39 U.S.C. 421 (sec. 3941, R.S., as amended).

A limited advertisement of temporary mail lettings is provided for in 39 U.S.C. 422. The advertising requirement was specifically extended to the letting of pneumatic-tube contracts by 39 U.S.C. 423.

Although the law authorizing the employment of mail messengers contained in 39 U.S.C. 578 contains no specific provision relative to advertising, such contracts are let only after advertising, in accordance with section 1769 of the Postal Laws and Regulations, 1932.

By the provisions of 39 U.S.C. 571 it is specifically provided that advertising may be dispensed with in entering into contracts with railroad companies.

Contracts for ocean-mail service are governed by the provisions of 46 U.S.C. 891, et seq. Subsections 891 (j) and 891 (k) require advertising and the award of the contract to the lowest bidder.

Under the provisions of 39 U.S.C. 429 there is a general requirement that all contracts for carrying the mails be awarded to the lowest bidder tendering sufficient guaranties for faithful performance in accordance with the terms of the advertisement.

A clear statement of reasons for the passage of the general act (39 U.S.C. 421), as well as the purpose and the scope thereof, is found in 13 A.G. 473.

39 U.S.C. 464, providing for the transportation of domestic air mail, requires advertising.

39 U.S.C. 465a, providing for contracts covering the transportation of mail by air to foreign countries and insular possessions, requires advertising.

In 6 C.G. 557, it was held that the mere inexperience of a bidder for an air-mail contract and the fact that it was newly organized were insufficient to warrant the nonacceptance of its lowest bid and the acceptance of a higher bid.

Cited without definite application:

It was held in United States v. Purcell Envelope Co. (249 U.S. 313) that the judgment of the Court of Claims sustaining a contract precluded the further consideration of a charge that the Postmaster General was imposed upon in awarding a contract to a concern without financial standing.

It was held in Crocker v. United States (240 U.S. 74):

"No recovery can be had upon a Government contract tainted with fraud and rescinded by the proper officer of the Government on that ground."

United States v. Carter (217 U.S. 286) involved a collusive conspiracy between a trusted officer of the Government and independent contractors. In its decision the Court commented upon the difficulty of discovering fraud in a well-planned case of this kind but, nevertheless, gave judgment against Carter.

In Frame v. Felix (Pennsylvania Supreme Court, 1895), reported in 27 L.R.A. 802, the court said:

"* * * It seems, therefore, to be beyond question that, under a provision requiring the submission of contracts for municipal work to competitive bidding and the awarding of them to the lowest responsible bidder, it is not lawful to fix in the specifications, on the basis of which the proposals are invited, any arbitrary sum to be paid for any part or item of the work to be done; and that the fixing of such a sum for any part or item of such work renders illegal the entire proceeding and the contract to which it may lead."

Proposition 5

The air-mail contracts for routes nos. 33 and 34 were void because clauses were inserted in the advertisements therefor which restricted open, free, and competitive bidding, and violated the provisions of law requiring such contracts to be awarded to the lowest responsible bidders.

Statement under proposition 5

In addition to other grounds, contracts held by the Transcontinental & Western Air, Inc., and American Airways, Inc., on routes nos. 33 and 34, respectively, are void under this proposition. A provision was inserted in the advertisement, arbitrarily and without legal authority, by Postmaster General Brown and his assistant, Glover, which restricted the bidding to those having flown their planes at night over a fixed schedule. The evidence shows that this provision was included in the advertisement for the sole and only purpose of freezing out competition. The uncontradicted evidence also shows that Postmaster General Brown was advised against this by Assistant Attorney General John Lord O'Brian and by the Comptroller General, who held it an illegal restriction. Nevertheless, in order to favor the operators who, it had been agreed, should receive these contracts, this night-flying provision was inserted into the advertisements under the direction of William P. MacCracken, Jr., one of the conspirators.

Clauses in advertisements for bids for Government supplies and services which tend to restrict open, free, and competitive bidding, and are not authorized by law, are violative of the provisions of law requiring such contracts to be awarded to the lowest responsible bidders.

In Kay v. Monroe (87 N.Y.S. 831) it appeared that the commissioner of water supply, gas, and electricity, in his advertisement limited bids in such a manner as to require bids only on a certain patented article under conditions calculated to practically exclude competition. His action was held violative of the Revised New York Charter provision enacted to afford a fair and reasonable opportunity for competition, the court basing its action on the decision in Rose v. Low (83 N.Y.S. 598).

In Randolph McNutt Co. v. Eckert (Court of Appeals, New York, 1931), reported in 177 N.E. 386, which involved a contract awarded by a board of education, the court said:

"If the board of education had violated subdivision 8 of section 875, as above quoted, by awarding a contract for school furniture in excess of $1,000 without advertising for estimates, the contract would be illegal. If it had accomplished the same result by indirection, that is, had so fixed or manipulated the specifications as to shut out competitive bidding or permit unfair advantage or favoritism, the contract likewise would be illegal."

The court likewise quoted the following paragraphs from Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th ed.), section 807:

"When by charter or statute a municipality can only let its contracts to the lowest bidder after advertisement, an implied condition and restriction is placed upon the proceedings of the municipality that the various steps adopted by it to let a contract shall be of such a nature and taken in such form as in good faith to invite competition. * * * The plan and specification are essential to competitive bidding because it is only through their agency that there is a reasonable assurance that all bidders are competing upon the same basis and without favoritism and that no fraud enters into the award."

In Burt et al. v. Municipal Council of City of Taunton (Supreme Court of Massachusetts, 1931), reported in 176 N.E. 511, the question involved advertising for a pumping engine and it was required that the advertisement should "set forth the specifications." The advertisement, as published, did not print the specifications under which the bids were invited. The court said:

"Manifestly this advertisement did not conform to the terms of the order. It did not set forth the specifications, but simply referred to a place where such as existed might be found. * * * The terms of the governing order are not open to doubt as to meaning. They are unequivocal and mandatory. They cannot be overridden, softened, or obliterated by custom. They must stand and be enforced in cases brought before the courts. To permit them to be frittered away would thwart their salutary design. As was said when the case was here at its earlier stage respecting that order as a whole: 'It is a provision of substance partaking of the nature of a rule for the conduct of the general business affairs of the city. Its purpose is to protect the financial interests of the city by preventing favoritism in awarding contracts and to put a limitation on the otherwise very broad powers of the city officers to bind the city by contract. Its tendency is to give full publicity to proposed city contracts, to establish genuine and open competition upon the same footing after proper advertisement, and to insure honest methods of letting contracts.'

"The conclusion is that the proceeding by the respondents as to advertising for bids was a nullity, and the bids submitted to not form the basis on which a contract can be awarded."

In People v. City of Buffalo (176 N.Y.S. 642, 647), the commissioner of public works, in advertising for tractors, inserted a specification that the tractors should be "interchangeable in all parts with the present tractors owned by the bureau of streets." The effect of this provision in the advertisement was such as to exclude from competition all other tractor manufacturers than the Pierce-Arrow Motorcar Co., since the trucks at that time owned were all Pierce-Arrow trucks. The court held that the restrictive provision in the advertisement was void, which automatically rendered all bids received in pursuance thereof void.

In Mackinnon v. Mayor and Common Council of City of Newark (Supreme Court of New Jersey, 1915), reported in 100 Atl. 694, the court said:

"Applying the general theory of these cases that all bidders must be on an equal footing and the statute that the award shall be to the lowest responsible bidder, the fifth reason is enough to vitiate the awards, viz, that the specifications required bidders to state the time of performance as well as the amount bid. This, of course, created double standard by the insertion of an element not recognized in the statute."

Cited without definite application:

Schulte v. Salt Lake City (Supreme Court of Utah, 1932), reported in 10 Pac. (2d) 625. It was held in part as follows:

"Independent of any statute regulating the awarding of contracts for the construction of public improvements, the city commissioners are required to act in good faith, without fraud, collusion, corruption, or palpable abuse of discretion, and with due fidelity to the public interests.

"* * * The general rule deducible from the adjudicated cases and textwriters is to the effect that, where there is no statutory limitation upon the power of the proper officers of a city to let contracts for public improvement, such officers have a broad discretion. Courts refuse to interfere with their control of the matter so long as they do not exceed the power delegated to them or invade private rights or act in bad faith or palpably abuse their discretion."

It was held in Stoll v. Mayor and City Council of Baltimore (Maryland Court of Appeals, 1932), reported in 162 Atl. 267:

"The object sought by sections 14 and 15 of the city charter, and similar provisions, is to encourage bidding for municipal contracts and prevent favoritism and extravagance in the awarding thereof. In order to accomplish this, the plans and specifications should set forth clearly and in sufficient detail the proposed work or materials desired, to furnish the same standard for each bidder. * * * Whether the city choose one or the other policy, there remains the limitation that the plans and specifications contained in the invitation to bid must be such as to insure fair competition and enable the authorities to award the contract to the lowest responsible bidder."

Texas Electric & Ice Co. v. City of Vernon (Ct. of Civ. App. of Tex., 1928), reported in Two Hundred and Sixty-sixth Southwestern, page 600, involved the legality of inviting bids from a few chosen bidders. The court said:

"* * * The writing of a few letters by the secretary, and the fact that the company furnishing the engines sent in a sealed proposal does not comply with this requirement of the charter. (The requirement for competitive bidding.) It is contemplated that the widest publicity be given to the city's intention to purchase and not that this intention shall be made known only to a chosen few."

Philadelphia Co. v. City of Pittsburgh (Sup. Ct. of Pa., 1916), reported in Ninety-seventh Atlantic, page 1083. In this case the city awarded a contract to a gas company without competitive bidding, alleging that the company receiving the award was the only one which could fulfill the contract without laying pipe for a considerable distance. In rejecting this contention the court said:

"* * * The parties who could determine whether, under the circumstances, it was practicable and profitable for the other two companies to compete for the present contract were not the city officials whose duty it was to let the contract, the jury or the court, but the companies themselves, and their judgment could only be ascertained in the manner prescribed in the city charter. * * * It is apparent from the terms of the contract made by the city officials with the Philadelphia company that it was important for the protection of the city against exorbitant rates that there should have been competitive bidding."

3. A.A.G. P.O.D. 398 involved a fraudulent and collusive pneumatic-tube contract. The award was set aside and annulled by the Postmaster General. In the consideration of the case by this office, the following language is used:

"* * * The insertion of conditions not contemplated in the advertisement, together with the reduction of the bid as submitted under the advertisement, unquestionably constituted a new proposal, and as this new proposal was not regularly and competitively made, it would seem most doubtful whether its acceptance was legal and whether the contract is good in law."

In this same opinion reference was made to an opinion of the Attorney General relative to the modification of a contract with the New York & Cuba Mail Steamship Co., which contract was awarded in pursuance of an advertisement for bids contemplating a 10-year term. The suggested modification was that the term be limited to 5 years. The Attorney General held:

"'The question is not free from doubt, but in view of the strictly competitive letting enjoined by the act, the safer opinion is that the change in the term is such a material change in the contract as to require new advertisement and a new letting.'"

4 A.A.G., P.O.D. 258 contains a discussion by a number of State cases involving the interpretation of statutory advertising requirements and serves to emphasize the view that officers awarding a contract are vested with discretionary power which will not ordinarily be questioned in the absence of evidence of fraud.

5 A.A.G., P.O.D. 185—a memorandum for the purchasing agent—suggests that combinations to prevent or impede bidding on contracts for furnishing the Department with mail bags and sacks might constitute an offense under section 5440, Revised Statutes (the conspiracy statute).

In United States v. Carr (132 U.S. 644, 651), attention was invited to the fact that under section 4057, Revised Statutes, the Postmaster General is required to cause suit to be brought to recover wrong or fraudulent payments in cases "where money of the Department has been paid to any person in consequence of fraudulent representations, or by the mistake, collusion, or misconduct of any officer or other employee in the Postal Service."

Montana ex rel. Robert Mitchell Furniture Co. v. Toole (55 L.R.A. 644.) In this case the court held that failure to render exact compliance with a provision of State law requiring advertising of contracts for supplies in two daily newspapers printed in the State—it appearing that such advertisement was made in only one newspaper—nullified the contract.

Proposition 6

The contract of National Parks Airways, Inc., is void for the reason that it is held in the form of a route certificate granted at a rate not authorized by law, and is contrary to public policy and against the public interest.

Statement under proposition 6

It may be said that the route certificate of the National Parks Airways, Inc., was not secured directly as a result of fraud, collusion, or conspiracy, but the fact remains, nevertheless, that it was procured through the efforts of some of the conspirators; and the route certificate was awarded to National Parks Airways, Inc., at a rate far in excess of the amount for which Mr. Alfred Frank had originally agreed to carry the mails. The Government was fully protected in this contract. The contractor was a solvent concern and could have been required to carry the mail at the old rate. Under the new rate established by the route certificate the contractor received more than twice as much as the price he had agreed upon to carry the mails, which amounted to approximately $650,000; and it certainly is against the public interest for such a contract as this to remain in effect.

Proposition 7

The contract held by Kohler Aviation Corporation is a subcontract, covering part of the route held by Northwest Airways, Inc., and is no more binding upon the United States than the contract of the original contractor; and the authority of the Postmaster General to make an extension of an existing air-mail route confers upon him the same authority to cancel the extension in the public interest.

Statement under proposition 7

The evidence shows that the Kohler Aviation Corporation attempted for several years to secure a contract over this route by competitive bidding. It was unable to obtain such a contract because Postmaster General Brown flatly stated that he would not establish this route by competitive bidding. He did finally offer to give an extension to the Northwest Airways, Inc., and to direct Northwest to transfer and sublet the contract to Kohler. This was done, and, without going into full details with reference to the Kohler contract, I deem it sufficient to say that the contract, regardless of the honest intentions of the Kohler Aviation Corporation and its officers, is tainted with the same fraud that surrounded the other contracts of Northwest Airways, Inc. If the contract of the Northwest Airways should be annulled, this contract would naturally follow along with it.

CONCLUSION

It has been the practice of the Government of the United States for officers who are charged with administrative duties and responsibilities to promptly annul contracts which have been unlawfully obtained without going further than to satisfy themselves as to the facts. This is true as to the Post Office Department in the purchase of supplies and in mail contracts unlawfully obtained or held.

During the administration of President Lincoln the Postmaster General summarily annulled all of the star-route mail contracts in the States of Virginia, Maryland, Missouri, and Kentucky because of alleged disloyalty to the United States.

At the beginning of the administration of President Garfield the Postmaster General in his administration, Hon. Thomas L. James, found that star-route contracts on 93 routes in the Western States of California, Oregon, other States, and all Territories west of the Mississippi River had been awarded and were held as a result of combinations and conspiracies between the contractors and the Second Assistant Postmaster General. The records show that President Garfield was amazed, and in reply to questions from Mr. James respecting the policy to be pursued said: "I have sworn to uphold the Constitution and the laws; I shall do my full duty. My instructions to you are, cut the ulcer out, no matter whom it hurts."

The star routes of that day are comparable to the air-mail routes of today, and we even have a case where an air-mail contract was fraudulently obtained and annulled. In 1927 Postmaster General New, under President Coolidge, found that air-mail contractors on the route between Cheyenne, Wyo., and Pueblo, Colo., had agreed between themselves for a division of the route and that the contract might be awarded to the highest of two bidders. This contract was promptly annulled without any further ado or hearing and on the same day that the fact was brought to the attention of the Postmaster General. In that case there was no general conspiracy to parcel out all air-mail contracts of the country and divide an appropriation of almost $20,000,000 annually, nor was the collusion and fraud participated in by Government officials as was done in this case.

The Court of Claims affords an opportunity for any person who may feel aggrieved by the annulment of his contract with the Government to enter suit for damages. I do not find a record of any suits ever having been filed in the Court of Claims respecting the annulment of fraudulent mail contracts.

For the reasons herein stated I am of the opinion that the principles stated in the foregoing authorities apply in this case.

I am further of the opinion that:

First. The extension of the contract for air-mail routes nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, dated November 6, 1929, and the route certificates issued in lieu of such contracts on May 3, 1930, were void because such contracts were extended and certificates issued pursuant to an understanding between the contract air-mail operators and the Post Office Department by which it was agreed that such routes would never be opened to competitive bidding but that the certificates and orders thereafter issued should be used as a basis for awarding all domestic air-mail routes to the corporations holding such route certificates.

Second. All route certificates issued by the Postmaster General to air-mail contractors after the date of May 19, 1930, are void for the reasons:

(a) That they were awarded as a result of a secret agreement between the holders of said certificates and officials of the Post Office Department on or about June 4, 1930, in order that the holders thereof might secure permanent contracts without competitive bidding;

(b) Because such certificates were fraudulently executed as a result of an illegal conspiracy between Post Office officials and the holders of such certificates;

(c) Because the awarding of such certificates was not in the public interest.

Third. Every extension of every domestic air-mail route made after date of June 4, 1930, by the Postmaster General was illegal and void because—

(a) Such extensions were made as a result of a prearranged conspiracy and agreement between the holders of said certificates and the Postmaster General of the United States by which it was agreed that such extensions would be let only to those corporations which it had been agreed should receive them;

(b) Such extensions were used as a subterfuge to prevent competitive bidding as required by law;

(c) Such so-called "extensions" were not extensions of existing routes in fact, but constituted in each case separate and distinct air-mail routes which should have been advertised for bids.

Fourth. Contracts on air-mail route no. 33, from Atlanta to Los Angeles, and no. 34, from New York to Los Angeles by way of St. Louis, awarded in September 1930, and route certificates issued thereunder in February 1933 are void because—

(a) They were illegal in their inception in that all air-mail contractors of the United States and officials of the Post Office Department entered into an illegal conspiracy and agreement that only those who later received such contracts would bid on such routes;

(b) The advertisement for bids contained restrictions and limitations preventing free, open, and unrestricted competitive bidding by air-mail operators which was not authorized by law, including a night-flying provision;

(c) Because such restrictions in the advertisement were placed therein by collusion, fraud, and conspiracy on the part of the parties who secured contracts and the Postmaster General of the United States;

(d) Such contracts were not let to the lowest responsible bidder as provided by law.

Fifth. All domestic air-mail contracts and route certificates executed prior to March 1933 are void as against public interest and as against public policy for the reason that in each instance air-mail operators have been paid more than twice as much for carrying the mail as provided for in the original advertisements, bids, contracts, and route certificates, there having been paid to such air-mail operators for the fiscal years beginning 1930 to and including the calendar year 1933 the sum of $78,000,000 and the air-mail space requirements having been valued at approximately $31,000,000, resulting in overpayment to air-mail contractors of approximately $47,000,000.

Sixth. All air-mail contracts and route certificates for domestic air-mail transportation may be annulled:

(a) By an Executive order of the President of the United States as provided in section 5 of the independent offices bill of the Seventy-third Congress;

(b) As provided in the act of Congress, as amended, of April 29, 1930; or

(c) By an order of the Postmaster General under 39 United States Code, section 432, which provides:

"No contract for carrying the mail shall be made with any person who has entered, or proposed to enter, into any combination to prevent the making of any bid for carrying the mail, or who has made any agreement, or given or performed, or promised to give or perform, any consideration whatever to induce any other person not to bid for any such contract, and if any person so offending is a contractor for carrying the mail, his contract may be annulled."

(d) By order of the Postmaster General when found to have been fraudulently or illegally awarded;

(e) Under section 1846 of the Postal Laws and Regulations, 1932, in the public interest.

Since these contracts were procured as a result of fraud, conspiracy, and collusion between Post Office officials and the holders of such contracts, it is my recommendation that if they be annulled, the action be taken on the grounds (c), (d), and (e) above mentioned.

KARL A. CROWLEY, Solicitor.

Mr. FESS obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I had hoped that the Senate might dispose of the pending bill today and take a recess or adjourn over until Monday, but it appears at this juncture impracticable to complete the consideration of the bill today. I therefore intend to move a recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning, with the assurance, after consultation with Senators on both sides of the Chamber, that the matter may be finally disposed of at an early hour in the day tomorrow.

I understand the Senator from Ohio does not desire to proceed at this hour this afternoon?

Mr. FESS. I should prefer to wait until tomorrow.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR URGENT NEEDS IN PUBLIC SERVICES

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a joint resolution (H.J.Res. 332) to provide appropriations to meet urgent needs in certain public services, and for other purposes. The committee has informally approved the bill and I have been authorized to report it favorably.

There are four items involved. The first is for $35,000 for expenses of special and select committees of the House. Of course, that is their matter, and I take it there can be no objection.

The next item is made necessary because in the Treasury appropriation bill, which was passed a short time ago and has become the law, there was a limitation of 32½ cents on print paper. Bids have been asked by the Department, and on that limitation of price none can be had. This merely repeals that limitation in the law.

The next is a matter of $474,000, which has been saved on the new buildings for the Departments of Justice, Post Office, and Labor, and the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is desired to use that money for furniture for those buildings. It has already been appropriated, and this is merely a reappropriation for that specific purpose.

The last item is for the repatriation of unemployed aliens who have been employed in the service of the United States Government on the Panama Canal. The President has made an arrangement about the matter.

I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was read twice by its title, considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes hereinafter enumerated:

LEGISLATIVE

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, there is now pending before the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys a bill (S. 3033) to reserve certain public-domain lands in Nevada and Oregon as a grazing reserve for Indians of Fort McDermitt, Nev.

It is a bill which deals entirely with the transfer of public lands to an Indian reservation. It should be in the hands of the Committee on Indian Affairs. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, has the Senator talked with the Chairman of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys?

Mr. McCARRAN. I have not talked with the chairman of the committee, but I did talk with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and I understood that he talked with the chairman.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask what is the subject matter of the bill?

Mr. McCARRAN. It involves the transfer of public domain surrounding an Indian reservation, for stock raising on the public domain, but that particular part of the public domain to be allocated to the Indian reservation. I think the bill should be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. That is my view.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations (and also withdrawing a nomination), which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received and nomination withdrawn, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters, which were ordered to be placed on the calendar.

HERBERT D. RUSSELL

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I send to the desk the favorable report submitted by me yesterday on the nomination of Herbert D. Russell to be postmaster at Conway, Ark. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. What is the reason why the Senator wants immediate consideration?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I can state the reason. The post office has been vacant for many months, and a number of investigations have been in progress and have delayed action on the appointment.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the nomination? The Chair hears none; and, without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask also that the President may be notified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be immediately notified.

The calendar is in order.

THE CALENDAR—TREATIES

The legislative clerk proceeded to read Executive B, Seventy-third Congress, second session, an international telecommunication convention, the general radio regulations annexed thereto, and a separate radio protocol, all signed by the delegates of the United States to the International Radio Conference at Madrid on December 9, 1932.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there are two treaties on the calendar. I do not know that there will be any particular opposition to them; but they are rather long treaties, and it will probably require half an hour to read them, and probably that long to explain them. I give notice that after the pending unfinished business shall have been disposed of, I shall ask for an executive session for the purpose of acting on the treaties.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The treaties will be passed over.

MYRTLE HUFTY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Myrtle Hufty to be postmaster at Paonia, Colo.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I thought I asked the other day—and, whether I did or not, I ask now—that this nomination be recommitted to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of M. Frank Hammond to be United States marshal, southern district of Texas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the President be notified of the confirmation of Mr. Hammond.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas that the President be notified? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified of this confirmation.

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Thomas Jefferson Coolidge, of Massachusetts, to be Under Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Richmond B. Keech to be a member of the Public Utilities Commission.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask that this nomination and that of William A. Roberts to be additional counsel, to be known as the "people's counsel", be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nominations will be passed over.

COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Daniel D. Moore to be collector of internal revenue, district of Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I object, and ask that that nomination go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be passed over.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc with the exception of no. 2046, the nomination of William R. Taylor to be postmaster at Fulton, Mo., which I ask to go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters on the calendar, with the exception of the one referred to, will be confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 13 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Saturday, April 28, 1934, at 10 o'clock a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate April 27 (legislative day of Apr. 26), 1934

COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE

Alex McKenzie Vierhus, of Everett, Wash., to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Washington in place of John C. Bowen.

FRIDAY, APRIL 27, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Gracious God, our Father, Thou who art the creator of every good thing, lay Thine hand upon us and bless us. Take from us the anxiety of a selfish mind and the unfruitfulness of cold affections. Grant, our Father, that all who are distressed may hear Thee whispering, "Come unto me and I will give you rest." As we pass through life may our hands be outstretched and our hearts warm to succor those who may need help and encouragement. At the close of this day give us, blessed Lord God, the sweet consciousness that we have been a little closer to the Heart Eternal. In our Savior's name. Amen.

MEMORIAL SERVICES

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives presided.

The Chaplain, Dr. Montgomery:

Almighty God, unto whom all hearts are open, all desires known, and from whom no secrets are hid, cleanse the thoughts of our hearts by the inspiration of Thy Holy Spirit that we may perfectly love Thee and worthily magnify Thy holy name. Amen.

Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D.D., Chaplain of the Senate, read the Scripture lesson of the service.

The Chaplain, Dr. Montgomery:

Eternal and ever-living God, our Father, we art met by common impulse to do honor to those servants of the public whose achievements have become a part of our Nation's history. We are grateful that their memory remains and that its influence becomes a benediction. We entreat Thee, our Father, to glorify this service by the presence of the Holy Spirit that we may be exalted, ennobled, and purified. We rejoice that we are born to a higher destiny and that there is a realm where the rainbow never fades. Strengthen us that we may cling to our faith; it will stand by us in the dying hour, in the flood, and in the dark of night. Grant, O Lord, as we look today into the future, may we have a heart for any fate that is unaffected by either laughter or tears. We pray Thee that we may pass from glory into glory until we are transformed into the complete image of the Divine. In this solemn moment we pause. Thou Savior of the world, we beseech Thee, give sweet rest to those who are in the shadows of grief and crown their souls with the simplicity of Thy truth and love. O walk with them and give them the answer to their longings until they kneel with their loved ones at the feet of God. Merciful Father, hold us all and help us to stand in the morning, in the noonday, in the evening shades until the end, and then let heaven's morning break. Savior Divine, we are pilgrims; be with us through the storm, through the sea, and through the waves until we reach that land that is unwet with the tears of human sorrow, where we shall not see through a glass darkly but face to face. In the name of our glorified Redeemer. Amen.

ADDRESS OF HON. JOHN YOUNG BROWN

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. We pause from our work today to pay tribute to the memory of our colleagues who in the past year laid aside the burdens of life. On the roll call of this body, a little over a year ago, they answered with the eagerness of men ready for duty; but today, as the Clerk sounds each name, it is met by profound silence. Assembling with us now are the close friends and relatives of the deceased. No words of ours can lessen their grief or lift their burdens, but we invite them here that they might share with us the knowledge of the Nation's gratitude for the useful lives of the ones whom they mourn.

As a new Member, it was not my privilege to know personally some of those who are no longer with us. I saw them collectively, however, as they went earnestly about the task set before them. They impressed me as sincere men, devoting their energies to the people's cause. They were a cross-section of the people whom they represented. Coming from different sections of the country and representing, perhaps, different types of citizenship, they at least met in common accord to devise plans which might lessen the burdens and increase the benefits to the masses of America's people. They held the hopes and the aspirations and represented generally the best and highest ideals of their people. They assembled here to carry out the work delegated to them. Ere their work was completed, they were called from this body to take a place among the colleagues of yesterday. Who is there prepared to say that they are not now members of a more glorious assembly?

It is not improper that we for a moment allow our imaginations to range over the field of those assembling in that other body of colleagues who answer no roll call here, but who still must look from somewhere beyond with interest upon the doings of this body. In that other group we find the founders of our Nation and those who guided zealously its course along the rocky shores of time. To me one of the most remarkable things in the history of this Republic is the type and caliber of men who have enlisted under the banners of public service.

Legislative bodies have always been the storm centers of public abuse and condemnation; and yet, in the 145 years of our existence, how few are the actual instances of corruption of public officials in this Republic! Always it has been true that selfish and greedy interests have had the best of mental talent to advance and protect their properties. The great unrepresented masses must depend upon volunteers to plead their cause. Whatever interest is taken in them is but incidental; and if a voice speaks out in their behalf, it does so usually without adequate compensation and sometimes without even commendation from the very people sought to be served. Those who have fought the people's fight in the past have done so not for remuneration but because it represented an investment of their ideas, their energy, and their talents in a cause which they believed to be just. Certainly, the harshest critic of Congress could not contend that membership in this House is sought for the sake of fortune. Private enterprise, in charting its course, may go into the markets of trade and buy the best of legal counsel. In appearing in the past before the committees of this House, business interests undoubtedly have brought here legal ability of the highest character; but certainly in the clashes with the people's interests, the people did not suffer when they had the magic mind of a Webster, the legal ability of a Clay, or the brilliant eloquence of a Bryan to plead their cause. Where could private initiative have employed men more brilliant, more devoted to the earnest pleading of their cause, or more courageous in the prosecution of their aims than the proud spirits who once stood in this well and fought the people's fight? Their public service procured for them no compensation which would provide life's luxuries, and yet it gave an opportunity for the investment of energy, intellect, character, and courage, which serves that purpose set forth in the preamble to our Constitution of promoting the general welfare and bringing happiness and liberty to the people. They blazed a new trail in the realm of government when they created and ordained a government deriving its powers and functions from the consent of the governed as against the idea of government by divine right. That this land has fallen a prey to ills they scarcely dreamed of is no fault of theirs but, rather, in contradiction to the purposes which they enunciated and to the causes for which they fought.

Few nations can boast of public servants freer from the taint of personal ambitions and greed than are ours. There have been exceptions, to be sure, but their lesser evils have been lost in the greater good. Our history has produced a long line of champions who have come here and in this well have fought to protect the people's interests, and now, to that long line of brilliant spirits of the past and to that galaxy of geniuses that have preserved this Nation we add the names of our 10 colleagues and the 4 Senators who served with us during the early months of this term. They submitted themselves to the will of the people at a time of national crisis. Many of their people were in want; and yet, amidst the pangs of hunger and the discord which hunger naturally brings, their constituency had faith in them. There has been no peril in the life of this Nation that compares in magnitude of threatened disaster with that which faced us in March of 1933. With our financial structure in collapse, with business stagnant, with only hope and faith to buoy them up, our colleagues came here to meet the peril and to do battle with the forces of adversity. They found the Nation suffering largely from diseases of its own making, bountifully supplied by nature with much more than the necessities of life, but denied by the greed of men an adequate distribution of life's benefits. With no thought of partisanship or of personal preferment they set upon the task before them, facing it in the spirit of—

One who never turned his back but marched breast forward,
Never doubted clouds would break,
Never dreamed, though right were worsted, wrong would triumph,
Held we fall to rise, and baffled to fight better, sleep to wake.

In the midst of their labors for the people they long had served, they were taken from their tasks by a Power whose decisions we cannot question. Some of them were men who had devoted a lifetime to the service of their State. Others had but started on the journey of life; but, old and young alike, they were consecrating their efforts and their abilities to the cause of helping America's people on the road toward their great objective—a more abundant life. That the impulses which they gave to that cause will continue after their departure we can have no doubt.

We are taught by the lessons of physics that in the world of nature matter is indestructible. They tell us that a pebble artlessly dropped into the Atlantic seaboard will set in motion an impulse that will not cease until it laps gently upon the brown foot of a native bathing boy on the shores of the Japan Sea. They tell us that a yodeling sound sent forth from the side of the Matterhorn will wend its way upon the waves of ether beyond the farthest star, never to cease. Science has not been able to reduce to the same certainty the indestructibility of the spirit. That has been left by the wisdom of the Almighty to the realm of faith. But can we not believe that the power that created no effect without cause, that made the ear that music might be heard, the eye that beauty might be seen, would not have created the great universal yearning of the human heart for immortality and left that yearning unfulfilled? Cato's thoughts are ours when he says:

It must be so—Plato, thou reasonest well—
Else whence this pleasing hope, this fond desire,
This longing after immortality?
Or whence this secret dread, and inward horror,
Of falling into naught? Why shrinks the soul
Back on herself, and startles at destruction?
'Tis the divinity that stirs within us;
'Tis heaven itself that points out an hereafter
And intimates eternity to man.

From the time the first savage crawled from his rude cave dwelling and bowed in worship before the rising morning sun, mankind has always yearned and dreamed for an existence after death. This yearning has not abated with the development of science and invention. It exists in the most modern of the modern with perhaps increased intensity. Of whatever state in life and without regard to creed or philosophy, there are always that inward tugging and that ray of hope that make us believe that man was not created to be eternally destroyed.

It was my privilege to travel over a number of the Western States with a former Member of this House, who represented, in my opinion, the aspirations and the hopes, and held the confidence of as many, of America's people as any individual in the last half century. I refer to the great Commoner. The common people believed in him; he had fought their fight. Wherever they needed a defense, he was there as their defender. With all his masterful oratory, the people knew that he would not play upon their sympathies and emotions and then betray them. He had been tested in too many battles where their interests were at stake, and at least the common people had never found him wanting. I saw the tanned sons of the soil as they flocked into town at the word of the coming of their champion. I watched them as they sat on the rude benches of those early Chautauqua days and with lifted eyes and lighted faces drank in the words that dropped from the eloquent tongue of this prophet of the people. He represented their hopes, and he gave to them a philosophy of faith. I can almost hear him now, as he reaches that high summation of all the hopes and faith of mortal men:

I shall not believe that this life is extinguished. If the Deity deigns to touch with divine power the cold and pulseless heart of the buried acorn and make it to burst from its prison walls, will He leave neglected in the earth the soul of man who was made in the image of his Creator? If He stoops to give to the rose bush, whose withered blossoms float upon the breeze, the sweet assurance of another springtime, will He withhold the word of hope from the children of men when the frosts of winter come? If matter, mute and inanimate, though changed by the forces of nature into a multitude of forms, can never die, will the proud spirit of man suffer annihilation after it has paid a brief visit, like a royal guest, to this tenement of clay? Let us rather believe that He, who in his apparent prodigality wastes not the raindrop, the blade of grass, or the evening's sighing zephyr, but makes them all to carry out His plan, has given immortality to the mortal.

So, may we not therefore in our faith believe today that our comrades have departed for the usefulness of a richer life, leaving behind them the impulses of their courage, their inspiration, their loyalty to inspire us to the completion of the task which they had begun; that in these halls, where once they were so active in debate, they still remain watching our efforts; that they are a part of the choir invisible—

> Of those immortal dead who live again
> In minds made better by their presence; live
> In pulses stirred to generosity,
> In deeds of daring rectitude, in scorn
> For miserable aims that end with self.
> In thoughts sublime that pierce the night like stars,
> And with their mild persistence urge man's search
> To vaster issues.

And now, after having listened for the last time to the roll call of our colleagues, we turn our faces from the past and set our eyes upon the future to meet new problems, to find new solutions, and may we from this occasion have gathered new faith in the eternal purpose of things, and in that faith may we be inspired to carve for the people of this Nation a destiny in the future worthy of the ideals and dreams of our comrades who are gone.

The Interstate Chorus sang "The Long Day Closes."

Hon. ALLEN T. TREADWAY, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts, delivered the following address:

ADDRESS OF HON. ALLEN T. TREADWAY

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the custom which was adopted a number of years ago, we are today assembled to pay homage to those Members of the House and Senate who during the past year answered their last roll call. They have passed on to yonder shore where, we are confident, a new life has opened for them from which we can feel they are participating in spirit with us on this occasion.

It is not for us to know what that life is, but as a reward for their faithful services here and their honorable careers in this life we believe that they are now beginning to live; to live that life of unimpaired influence and unmingled happiness for which their talents and services were destined.

> These shall resist the empire of decay
> When time is o'er and worlds have passed away;
> Cold in the dust the perished heart may lie,
> But that which warmed it, can never die.

The intimate relations between Members here particularly qualify us to join in sympathetic sorrow for the kinfolk of our departed colleagues who are assembled with us on this occasion. We extend our sympathy not only to those here in person, but likewise to those relatives who for various reasons are unable to participate in these exercises today.

The consolation to us and to the bereaved families is the thought that the tasks of these men were accomplished. They were found faithful in the duties of a position of trust. They bore the burden of the affairs of Government from which springs the greatness of our Republic. We may be great in area, in natural resources, in grand mountains and verdant hills, and we may have all the underlying characteristics of a great nation, but there can be no cohesion or strength in it unless the human equation is preeminent.

As generations come and go, this country, fortunately, has enlisted in its public service the men who could bring our natural qualifications under guidance. Those guides are the selected ones of the people who represent them in these Chambers. If they should fail, the country would be the sufferer. The men whom we honor here today carried on and made their contribution to the success of Government. Such leadership entitles them to all praise that we can bestow upon them. In behalf of the Members of Congress, it is my privilege to share in expressing our appreciation of them in these all-too-insufficient words.

Among the great compensations enjoyed by Members of Congress are the precious friendships formed here. These friendships grow up without regard to party affiliation, and in some instances closely rival the brotherly affection of Damon and Pythias and other comrades of legend.

Friendship—how sweet is this wonderful boon of earth! It involves so many things, but above all, the power of going out of oneself and appreciating whatever is noble and loving in another.

Looking back upon our associations with our late lamented brethren, we can conjure up many happy recollections. As we who are left behind continue along life's pathway, our journey will be made more pleasant as these recollections spring to mind.

> Grant but memory to us—

Said the poet Whittier—

> And we can lose nothing by death.

Longfellow wrote:

> The grave itself is nothing but a covered bridge
> Leading from light to light through a brief darkness.

Unfortunately, it is only after these associations have been severed by the Grim Reaper that there comes to us a full realization of how much we treasured them. It is, therefore, fitting that we should pause in our deliberations for this brief period, that we may pay to their memories a final and affectionate tribute.

> To live in hearts we leave behind
> Is not to die.

We whose services here extend over a period of years have seen many faces come and go. The procession is endless. Those of us who have witnessed the procession the longest naturally have made the most friends, but as we look about and reflect upon the number who have "gone before", a strange loneliness comes over us.

> Men drop so fast, ere life's midstage we tread,
> Few know so many friends alive, as dead.

While we "await alike the inevitable hour", and though death is as natural as birth, yet we cannot but feel that the passing of our late colleagues in each instance was hastened by the strain and stress of the times.

The work of a conscientious Member of Congress at any time is exacting, but perhaps at no time in the history of our country has it been more strenuous than during the past few years.

What achievements have been wrought within the historic walls of these Chambers! If on every spot where some noble servant has struggled to bring this land into a harvest of promise, if on every grave of every hero of this Capitol there should spring up some vine, some fruitful tree, some spray of flowers, our whole land would be a beautiful garden and the air would be filled with fragrance.

Our departed colleagues had devoted varying periods of time to the public service, ranging from 2 years to a third of a century. Some had attained positions of high honor in their States before coming to the National Legislature. Being gifted beyond the lot of most men, they forged their way to the top of the ladder of success by their ability.

Our country grows as the years roll on; its mighty structure is builded of the living stones that marshal themselves to forms of ceaseless labor amid the responses of a free and intelligent people; and, may I add, there is only one way to have good public servants, and that is for our fellow citizens to be worthy of being well served.

Plutarch said that the measure of a man's life is the well spending of it and not the length. Our late colleagues could well afford to have their lives judged by this standard. Those dear ones who are left behind them can be justly proud of their records of service and achievement.

The passing of these distinguished men is a loss not alone to their families, but to the Nation. Skilled in statecraft, trained in lawmaking, and experienced in public affairs, their services are no longer at the call of a Nation which today stands sorely in need of all the leadership it can secure. Yet of necessity others must rise to take their places; and because these men lived, the course of those who succeed them will be made the more smooth.

With the passing of these illustrious men, we again come face to face with the age-old question, Is death the end? If this question need be answered in the affirmative, our heads might well be bowed today in grief and sorrow, and we should bid a long farewell to all that is good and great in the being of man. If the soul of man returns to dust along with his flesh, there would be occasion indeed for lamentation and despair.

There is no unbelief;
Whoever plants a seed beneath the sod
And awaits to see it push away the clod,
Trusts in God.

Job asked, "If a man die, shall he live again?" Philosophers have debated this question for centuries, but it has never been answered by any definite proof. We know that men have dreamed of immortality, and we know that the desire for everlasting life is universal. Yet we cannot prove immortality. In spite of this, men have persisted in the belief that "Death is but the beginning and not the end." There are so many spiritual capacities in man which he cannot develop in this life that they point to a better and more harmonious future.

We are taught to believe that the Savior's mission on earth was to bring immortality to light, yet even He did not try to prove its existence. Neither did He argue the question, nor go into details as to what the future life would be.

In my Father's house are many mansions—

Said the Lord—

If it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you.

Our faith accepts this assurance. We would be questioning our own beliefs if we expected to be told of the particular mansion a man would occupy. Enough for us mortals to realize that a place has been prepared for those of us who are worthy of being received in the Father's house.

Thus our belief in immortality is based upon faith, which, we are told in Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews, is—

The substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.

We firmly believe that we shall meet our departed colleagues again in that—

House not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

We rest assured that our dear friends have only—

Gone before
To that unknown and silent shore.

Life is like the march of an army; it is attended by tremendous hardships and losses. How unjust, how incomplete, and how pathetic life would be without immortality. Man is a biworld creature. The testimony of reason and experience teaches that life is too short for his unfoldings; threescore and ten years are not sufficient. St. Paul recalled his career of sufferings during which he had been mobbed, stoned, and flogged; and he said that were there no hope beyond the grave, he would be of all men the most miserable. If this world ends all, what a tragedy of injustice it all is, and nothing has been so cheap as man.

What initiative and aspirations stir in his heart. The heart will smother unless it finds breathing room in a larger world. In the London Tower Sir Walter Raleigh could pace only twice his length. How his soul cried out against the limits of his dungeon life bounded by four walls. So man rebels against those walls called the cradle and the grave. He asks all the air there is between his soul and God's throne. He wants the sweep of the eternities.

Our lives are but marches to the grave. Death is no stranger to us, but is continually in our presence. The very moment we were born we began to die, yet because we have faith in the hereafter we are not afraid. We realize that death is only the way to a fuller life.

Though we walk through the valley of the shadow of death, we fear no evil.

Sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust—

We are prepared to approach our grave—

Like one that wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

The grave is like the gate in the old temple, iron on one side but beaten gold on the other. Dying is transportation, home-going, happiness, and a satisfied heart forever.

As I stand here today participating in these memorial services, my mind wanders back to a somewhat similar service held within these four walls a number of years ago when there lay here, still in death, all that was mortal of the illustrious and beloved former Speaker, the late lamented Champ Clark. On that occasion the then senior Senator from Missouri, the Hon. James A. Reed, delivered what to my mind was one of the most beautiful and eloquent funeral orations ever uttered. His words were so inspiring and touching, and so far beyond my power of expression, that I want to repeat now one or two passages that especially appealed to me. He said:

A wonderful stream is the river of life. A slender thread emerging from the mysterious realm of birth, it laughs and dances through the wonderland of childhood. Its broadening currents sweep between the flower-decked banks of youth, romance, and hope. A mighty torrent, it rushes over the rapids of manhood and breaks in form upon the rocks of opposition and defeat, then glides away across the barren, sterile fields of age until it is engulfed and lost within the waters of the eternal sea. There queenly robes, the beggar's rags, the rich man's gold, the pauper's copper pence, the jeweled diadem of princes, and the thorny crown of martyrs are washed and swept by the same ceaseless tides.

The miracle of birth and the mystery of death remain the unsolved problems of all time. The shepherd who 3,000 years ago upon the plains of Syria observed the procession of the planets and contemplated the decrees of fate was as wise perhaps as is the wisest of today. He only knew that, standing here upon the bank of time, his straining eyes could not glimpse even the shadowy outline of a farther shore. He only could behold the white sails of receding fleets—ships that sail out but never come again. He only knew that at the grave's dread mouth all men must cast aside alike the burden of their honors and their griefs; that man takes with him only that which he has freely given away, that even death may not despoil him of the riches of service and self-sacrifice.

Some listening to my voice heard these words delivered. Some of those whose memories we honor today were our colleagues then. In the course of inevitable changes I am repeating them today as applicable to our departed brethren of the year as they were to the former Speaker of this House in whose memory they were first uttered.

The years are forming and disappearing; they are woven and unraveled; time is speeding on. Let the chaff and the evil part of this life pass with them; let us expel from our lives all sordid aims and purposes; bring them together with all jealousies and passions and drop them into the gulf of oblivion and turn glad feet unto the way that leads unto permanent happiness and virtue.

Beyond the flood of the years lies the immortal shore. Some hour the mists will lift for us, the clouds will roll away, and the clear summits of the far-off land shall stand clothed with God's own benediction.

Blessed is he whom Thou hast chosen and taken unto Thee, for he shall dwell in Thy courts.

Arthur S. Witcomb, of the United States Marine Band, rendered as a cornet solo "Lead, Kindly Light."

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., pronounced the benediction:

The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost be with us all evermore. Amen.

THOMAS JAMES WALSH

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, would that my humble lips were able to proclaim the greatness of the Honorable T. J. WALSH, for if there be one man in American history whose honesty, integrity, and renown make him a fitting subject for eulogy, that man is the Honorable THOMAS J. WALSH, late of Montana.

His patriotism and love of country never faltered; his courage and fearlessness are household words in America; and the love which he bore his Nation was evidenced by his willingness to accept in his years of declining energy the arduous duties of the Attorney Generalship of the United States, at the request of the man whose candidacy he had done so much to promote, the present President of the United States, Franklin D. Roosevelt. His sole reason for acceptance of the post tendered him by the President was his desire to cooperate with that fearless champion of the people in his endeavor to bring about a new deal in America. It is well known that he would have much rather continued in the position of United States Senator, in which his judgment was free and independent and his life circumscribed only by the voter on election day, than to leave that position for higher honors.

My statement regarding WALSH is brief. He was a man, first of all, of honor, whose word was as good as his bond. He was a statesman whose knowledge of the problems of state and whose comprehensive understanding of the intricacies of governmental action constituted him a loss beyond measure to the American people. When his inscription shall have been written upon the pages of American history may it place these words upon his lips, "I have fought the good fight; I have run my course; and I have kept the faith."

Mr. AYERS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following eulogy to the late Senator THOMAS J. WALSH by Senator BURTON K. WHEELER, of Montana:

Something like 20 ponderous historical volumes have been published about Montana. I have searched them all, and in all I find but a few scant lines about my friend, the late Senator THOMAS JAMES WALSH. He was the most distinguished citizen Montana has developed, unquestionably among the Nation's four or five greatest advocates, and one of the most able men ever to gain a seat in the United States Senate. It is shameful that such a man has not found a larger place in our histories. Therefore, this talk, planned as a eulogy, has by necessity and duty become a brief biographical sketch.

It is not such an outline as Senator WALSH's fame entitles him, for it should have been prepared by a scholar with ample time and resources and not dictated by a Senator during the rush and hurry attendant at the close of an extremely tiring session of Congress.

I knew Senator WALSH as well, perhaps, as anyone outside his own family. I loved him, and I cherish his memory. He was almost like a father to me from the day I first took my seat in the Senate in 1923 until his death, March 2, 1933. I wish that I had the time and the ability to prepare material worthy of his name.

BORN AT TWO RIVERS, WIS.

THOMAS JAMES WALSH was born at Two Rivers, Wis., on June 12, 1859, the son of Felix and Bridget Comer Walsh. His parents were natives of Ulster, but Catholics, and the boy was brought up in the same faith. He attended the public schools and began teaching, himself, at Two Rivers at the age of 16. As he taught, he studied and proceeded to take examinations of mounting grades, county and State, so that when 21 he had gained a teacher's certificate entitling him to teach anywhere in Wisconsin for life.

That was typical of Senator WALSH. He early developed an amazing capacity for hard work. All his life he drudged and stored away in his fine mind the fruits of a wealth of basic reading. As a boy he had a purpose in life. He was not quick as many at making friends, but having made one, he never let him get away. Teaching and studying, following a rigid routine, Senator WALSH had passed all the teacher's examinations at 21. Then he carefully and methodically completed the law course at the University of Wisconsin and received his degree in 1 year.

LOVED SPORTS AS A YOUTH

I would not have you think that, as a boy, Senator WALSH was unsocial. He was earnest, serious, and unconvivial and given to laborious days in early life as in late, but he was not entirely a grind. He loved baseball, and I have heard him tell, 40 years later, of the Centennials, as the boys called the club he organized in 1876. He played second base. He loved horseback riding. As a fisherman he was superb. Many of my most pleasant hours with him were spent in Glacier National Park trying to capture the elusive trout. That also is a test of character, and Senator WALSH was an ideal fishing companion. In later years he developed a touch of austerity, but he always enjoyed companionship with his fellows. A game of golf, a leisurely, contented evening or dinner party with friends, was a delight to him. Devoid of witticisms, he enjoyed the talent of his companions. Always, he was courteous and willing to listen to others, unassumingly, and unassertingly. These qualities and virtues were cultivated and became ingrained in his being during the discipline of youth.

MOVES TO SOUTH DAKOTA

Upon graduation from the law school of the University of Wisconsin, WALSH immediately formed a partnership at Redfield, S.Dak., with his brother, Henry C. Walsh. Five years later he was married to Elinor C. McClements, of Chicago. She was an inspiration and partner in her husband's extra-legal activities. One child was born to them, Genevieve, now Mrs. Emmet C. Gudger, whose husband is a naval commander.

LOCATES AT HELENA, MONT.

A year later he moved to Montana. As to his activities in Montana prior to his election to the United States Senate, Dr. D. B. Price, of Helena, writes me as follows: "Mr. WALSH came to Montana in 1890, locating in Helena, which was his home to the close of his successful and brilliant career, March 2, 1933. He was of medium height; compactly built; graceful head; steel-gray eyes; black hair and a heavy mustache; quick of motion; mentally alert; never trifilingly employed; in full command of his emotions; self-contained; self-determined; capable of giving up himself to a cause; of analyzing his own motives; self-reliant; ready to take responsibility; ever conscious of conforming to a worthy standard of conduct and thought, always avoiding excess of any kind; an indefatigable worker and student; a diplomat in that he was successful in choice of time for and adaptation of method to circumstances; the personification of courtesy. His reasoning was faultless. He was an advanced liberal in politics, aggressively progressive, supporting all the new measures which seemed to him to be for the public good, in State and national politics. As a lawyer he was devoted to his profession and to the interests of his client. He reached the heights by dint of effort and native ability.

"He came to Helena at the age of 31, at the time the State's principal industry, mining, was involved in turbulent legal battles—conflicts of years before its problems were thoroughly settled, and from which he emerged as an authority on mining law. His style was lucid, his words always conveying to the mind of the layman the points and principles of law at issue, and that right and justice constituted the essence or indispensable quality of the law, and that the law, when rationally and honestly construed, was the mighty key facts of civilization, those required for the understanding, the promotion and defense of liberty, and the essential chart of the future of human society. His exposition of the law was at once accurate and animated. His simplest sentences had the clear ring of enlightened intention. His briefest statement of fact was a blow at all that threatened the rights of humanity and his clients.

WINS BY PRIMARY ELECTION

"Desire for public service had become the dominant purpose and aim of his life, and in 1906 he entered the campaign for Representative in Congress. One donor to his campaign fund gave $500, saying he thought it was worth it to get his energetic and efficient competitor interested in some other activity. His campaign was unsuccessful. So also was his campaign for the Senate in 1910. Undaunted by defeat, buttressed by a deep conviction that there was a need for his services in the Congress of the United States, he continued his campaign, and by 1912 there had been enacted in primary law, and while the election was actually in the hands of the legislative assembly, its members were pledged to vote for the candidate for the United States Senate nominated by the primary. He worked hard for the election of members of the legislature favorable to his candidacy, and won the nomination in the primary and the election by the unanimous vote of the joint assembly, perhaps the only instance on record. From the beginning of his request for recognition as a suitable man for congressional honors he was his own prophet and defender, subsequent events confirming his judgment of himself and of an enlightened citizenship.

"'Know thyself; in nothing excess', the one brief sentence in all literature which does completely portray the character of T. J. WALSH. Living well is an art, and he who lives well in the relationships of husband and father, counselor, public servant, and citizen, looks back from the summit of his years, thinking, no doubt, especially of his loved ones to whom he had given constant solicitude, for as wise and good parents grow older, they experience no joy comparable to that of having founded a home and given to the world children of industry, integrity, and personal worth.

MAN OF INTENSE IDEALS

"THOMAS J. WALSH wanted to be a lawyer, a philosopher, a statesman, a character in American annals—and he was; a man of intense ideals, capable of righteous indignation against iniquity—he proved it, and the Nation will come to appreciate it. He had an intuition for progressive movements and a quick and keen apprehension of the character and location of reactionary forces. Even his friends did not realize what he was doing, working ceaselessly. His equipoise was splendid. With tireless patience he pursued the even tenor of his way with open-minded frankness, moral and intellectual integrity, courage, sound judgment, and level-headedness. His advice and opinions were highly esteemed and were accorded sincere weight. He was conscientious in thought and action; gentle of spirit, his heart beat in unison with his fellowman, and it was not o'erleaping ambition or crass love of power or gain that caused him to devote the best part of his life to the services of his country and State. He bequeathed to posterity what is greatest of all, a record of splendid and useful achievement, a stainless reputation, and a lasting sense of gratitude in the hearts of his constituency—the people of Montana.

"'His life is now beyond
The reach of death or change.'

"And, according to the assurances of his own faith, gloriously beginning. What he believed in, he stood for with unwavering fidelity and consistency. A noble and loyal husband, a devoted and proud father, a man transparently and undeniably Christian, but who never intentionally or wittingly intruded his views upon any person or into any situation, an able and sagacious lawyer, a loyal citizen, friend, and neighbor. He is gone, 'wearing the white flower of a blameless life.'"

To Dr. Price's estimate of Senator WALSH's life in Montana prior to his election as United States Senator, I would add only that he was always the friend of the underdog and the sworn enemy of land grabbers and shady concerns.

TELLING BLOWS FOR LABOR

Senator WALSH struck some of his most telling blows for labor. One of our greatest students of constitutional law, his first speech in the Senate was in behalf of a bill to make jury trials essential in instances of contempt of court in injunction cases. This first speech gave him the respect of his colleagues. His speeches were always crowded with facts and packed with careful reasoning. Often they did not appeal to the galleries. There was about him an air of near shyness; yet when his blows landed, his opponents were stunned because of his reliance on facts. He led the fight for the confirmation of Justice Brandeis in the Supreme Court, and his brief has been called a "model of persuasiveness and finality." He flayed the cruelties and injustices of the Department of Justice in the so-called "red scares", led by A. Mitchell Palmer. Palmer was a Democrat, but all wrongdoers were alike to WALSH. Palmer was engineering the "red raids" during the hysteria at the close of the World War. "It is only at such times", WALSH said, "that the guaranties of the Constitution as to personal rights are of any practical value. In seasons of calm no one thinks of denying them. They are accorded as a matter of course."

DRAFTED SUFFRAGE AMENDMENT

He helped draft the prohibition and woman suffrage amendments to the Constitution. He drew the case against the seating of Truman H. Newberry, of Michigan. He supported the child-labor amendment. He helped draw national attention to the abominable conditions that then prevailed in the steel industry by placing in the RECORD the Interchurch Report on the Steel Strike. It was WALSH who led the fight to prevent the use of Federal money to prosecute trade unions under the Sherman Act. He was a sturdy fighter for a low tariff.

He was in charge of those clauses of the Clayton Act that exempted all farm and labor organizations from prosecution under the Sherman law. I remember, especially, one magnificent fight that he made to have the status of public-utility companies investigated by a Senate committee. One of the most powerful lobbies the Capitol has ever seen—with endless money—opposed that proposal, but WALSH stood on the floor, hour after hour, making a grand fight. In the end the investigation was conducted by the Federal Power Commission. He was one of the first Senators to insist on Federal regulation of excessive stock-exchange speculation.

Senator WALSH was enthusiastic for general disarmament. When the Treaty of Versailles was before the Senate, he advocated the entry of this country into the League of Nations. Later he favored vast concessions. He was always for the World Court. When discussions came up over the Japanese situation, there were some who urged an economic boycott. WALSH, a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, pointed out the dangerous consequences. "An economic boycott", he declared, "is apt to lead to war."

He did not hesitate to criticize such large concerns as the Aluminum Co. of America and at a time when it was not popular to do so. He assailed the action of the Department of Justice in the treatment of the Aluminum Co., but his findings were not accepted by the Senate. He was firmly opposed to professional political lobbyists.

DEFENDS WILSON IN OIL SCANDALS

It was a dangerous undertaking to oppose this quiet-mannered gentleman in anything he undertook to know about. On one occasion a Senator from Indiana attempted to connect the Wilson administration with the oil scandals. Senator WALSH riddled the charges. In rebuttal he piled high figures, documents, quotations, and facts, facts, facts. Then he had three great maps brought in, and as the dispatches of the day said, "with a pointer, like a school teacher, illustrated his points as he went minutely into the history of the reserves to refute ROBINSON."

WILLIAM HARD WRITING OF WALSH

I want to give his Montana friends a true picture of Senator WALSH in the Senate. I quote from William Hard in Colliers for May 15, 1924:

"For years in the Senate it seemed that if a subject was peculiarly dull, it would peculiarly be Mr. WALSH who would arise to discuss it.

"Did the President appoint Senator Smoot and Representative Burton to be members of the World War Foreign Debt Commission? Did the question thereupon arise whether or not a Senator and a Representative could constitutionally be appointed to such a body? Did this question involve constitutional niceties and legalistic intricacies which hardly anybody could grasp?

"Very well. WALSH of Montana at once arose, and from behind large books piled high upon his desk proceeded at once to deliver a speech so constitutionally learned, so legalistically subtle, so profound, so abysmal that those of his hearers who could understand it gasped, and the rest were near to swooning.

"Thus in the Senate, among his fellow Senators, Mr. WALSH rightfully gained the reputation of being one of the Senate's deepest minds; and thus for the occupants of the press gallery, who could not put disquisitions on the Constitution into their news stories, Mr. WALSH remained a total loss."

And a little later this same writer could say of him: "A modest man, a man insistent upon truth and unassertive of himself, a man who has the respect of his colleagues for his moral qualities as much as for his mental qualities, a man whose manners and methods seem to condemn him to be known and admired by the few, he is now known by the many. Yet his true title to their regard is that among the few who knew him and admired him in the days of his popular obscurity, he is still, for his unchanged heart and unchanged demeanor, just as much admired, just as much loved."

THE STORY OF THE OIL SCANDALS

The country has never witnessed a more surprising drive through a jungle of misrepresentation than that conducted by WALSH in the famous Teapot Dome and Elk Hill oil-reserve scandals. Because of my own close connection with that case, I give a summary by Charles Michelson as published by the North American Review of February 1926:

"He went into the oil investigation on a shoestring. All he had to start with was a couple of leases to Sinclair and Doheny, and some sudden prosperity of Albert B. Fall. * * * The committee that inherited the investigation generally felt that, after all, the validity of the leases hinged on whether it was a good or a bad deal for the Government, and there was as much authority for the position that it was necessary to operate the reserved fields to prevent their being drained by nearby wells, as for the other theory. That committee had not been going 2 days before it changed its identity and ever after was the 'Walsh committee.' He was not its chairman; Lenroot, who had the title, was lost in the shuffle, and WALSH simply took possession of the show. When Edward B. McLean came out with his declaration that he had loaned Fall $100,000, taking his notes and a mortgage on the Fall ranches as security, all of the Members, except WALSH, thought the bottom had fallen out of the scandal. It was so perfectly credible; just such a thing as McLean might have done, in view of his membership in the Harding circle of which Fall was so conspicuous an ornament. They advised WALSH to close the investigation and leave the matter of the validity of the leases to the courts. Not he; his nose was on the trail, and he intended to follow it, so he hiked off to Florida, put McLean under oath, and the excuse for Fall's sudden prosperity was blown sky-high with McLean's admission that the checks he handed Fall were returned uncashed, and that his previous story was merely his 'going down the line for a friend.'

"There followed as a natural sequence the coming to the witness stand of Doheny, with his little black satchel, and the tale of an old prospector's affection for his one-time trail mate. It was an appealing picture with its mellowed reflection of the dim frontier; the soft side of a hard-boiled oil multimillionaire, of youthful companionship in poverty and hardship merging into the friendship of men in the decline of life. It sounded as plausible as the McLean story—to everybody but WALSH. To him it was only scenery along the route he had marked out, and he herded the two of them into the criminal courts."

A GREAT DEMOCRAT

Senator WALSH took a large and increasingly important part in the deliberations of the Democratic Party. He was a delegate to the national convention seven times, and twice chairman, in 1924 and in 1932. His address as permanent chairman at the Chicago convention was a gem of English and reasoning. It demonstrates that he was alive to the unparalleled economic conditions that confront the country.

"Prices have fallen so that debts, incalculably vast, have doubled, and they continue to fall, paralyzing industry and checking enterprise", he warned. "Out of such conditions, as history teaches, revolutionary movements arise and flourish. The plight of our own country excites concern in every patriotic mind. In desperation Congress is moved to adopt measures of relief with little regard for constitutional limitations or for what, under ordinary circumstances, would be considered as sound economic principles."

CALLED TO CABINET

A few weeks before his death he reluctantly accepted a call from President-elect Roosevelt to serve in the Cabinet as Attorney General. His function in the Cabinet was to have been that of a "balance wheel." He was to have a more important place than that indicated by the title of Attorney General. Rather he would have been the "elder statesman" of the Cabinet, a man of progressive views, tempered with years of experience in public life, contributing also the force of character he displayed throughout his life and especially during the Teapot Dome investigation.

HIS STRENGTH OF CHARACTER

Senator WALSH's greatest strength was his character; his second, intellectual ability; and third, his love for hard work. A few days before his death one of the opposition newspapers said of him that "no wise Democratic politician is likely to go to him in his new job looking for special favors." "It would be", the New York Sun added, "like asking the statue of civic virtue for a chew of tobacco."

Never was there an instance in which a man in public life was more certainly the master architect of his own fortune than THOMAS J. WALSH, so far as I know. He was not an actor, but a teacher—saw his constituency, the cause he espoused, his country, and, above all, he saw himself. As an advocate or prosecutor there was a sting in his simplicity and seriousness. He was not looking for style or stage effect, but expressed what he had to say for its own sake, without a wasted word.

Emerson said: "He only is a well-made man who has good determination", and no one who knew TOM WALSH ever claimed that he lacked determination.

His attacks against wrong and injustice in high places was pungent, fearless, militant, unspoiled, untouched by any censor's squeamish or faltering hand. His courage was an inspiration. He had the gift of forcing honest and open opposition, for he never used evasive or misleading tactics in fighting a political foe or one guilty of malfeasance. One of his noticeable gifts was the knowledge of when to strike a blow—when he was prepared, when he could choose the terms of conflict, and with vigor dispatch the foe facing him.

His name had become a national household word; an atmosphere of esteem and affection had grown about his personality; he had done the day's work of a man, and who knows but that "a destiny of necessity" touched him out of life's turbulent picture at the fortunate moment.

Not that it will add one iota to his fame, but so that his friends who may treasure this volume will have available a few estimates of his achievements and character, I append but a dozen short comments from the hundreds that have come under my eye in the public print or have been sent to me by all classes of citizens. The life of THOMAS JAMES WALSH offers a fascinating field for the historian, and I am hopeful that some day in one of our colleges there will be found a man with the training and the ability to prepare a history of his life worthy of the man.

President Roosevelt: "Senator WALSH was one on whom I always relied for wise counsel and advice."

Former President HOOVER: "Senator WALSH's public service has been so varied and so distinguished as to make his fame secure and his death a grievous public loss."

Vice President Garner: "Few men have been closer to the hearts of the American people, and no man has been more conscientious and diligent in protecting the interests of the people as a whole."

Secretary Cordell Hull: "No finer patriot or abler statesman has come into our national life during my time."

Senator ASHURST: "One of the ablest lawyers I ever knew."

Senator LA FOLLETTE: "A splendid public servant."

Former Senator Watson of Indiana: "A high-minded man, honorable in all his relations with life, clean in all his habits, and his death—a distinct loss, not only to the incoming administration, but to the whole country."

Senator BORAH: "His death was a national calamity. With all due respect to the other members of the Cabinet, he was the man who had been tried and tested in public service and who stood out as an able and patriotic public servant."

Senator JOE T. ROBINSON: "He was an outstanding leader in the Democratic Party and a man of undoubted integrity and notable ability."

Senator COPELAND: "The American people lost a great champion."

Former Vice President Curtis: "Senator WALSH was a very valuable man, an outstanding legislator, and a man of wonderful ability."

Governor Lehman of New York: "A man of commanding ability, sterling character, and rugged honesty."

Mr. MOREHEAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following tribute to the late Senator THOMAS J. WALSH, of Montana, by Hon. JAMES COUZENS, Senator from Michigan:

The work done by THOMAS J. WALSH, United States Senator from Montana, from 1913 to 1933, has made a place for him in the history of our country. Nothing that we can say or write would add to his renown. I wish, however, as one who served with him for a number of years in the Senate and as one who had many opportunities to know him intimately, to pay my humble tribute to him. He was a true public servant, and one who is a true public servant has fulfilled his mission in this world. By his deeds we knew him, and by his deeds the historians of the future will know him.

The life and work of Senator WALSH impressed me with another thought. More and more it occurs to me that we live by a natural and perhaps a supernatural rule. We progress. The instinct in us individually and the collective instinct are to rise to a higher plane of civilization. As we contribute to this general effort, we live; and as we stand in the way, we perish. The fittest survive, and the fittest mean only those who desire to make this a better world in which to live, or, in other words, the spiritually fit as contrasted with the materially fit.

Senator THOMAS J. WALSH gave unstintingly of himself to make this a better world in which to live. He was an honorable man, a fine example for our young men to follow in his ideals of public service. The mills grind slowly but exceedingly fine. There is no friend of Senator WALSH who need have any fear that in this process of grinding Senator WALSH or his memory will suffer. The grinding will merely add luster to his name and his memory.

ROBERT BEECHER HOWELL

Mr. MOREHEAD. Mr. Speaker, Senator ROBERT BEECHER HOWELL was the son of Andrew and Mary Adelia Beecher (Tower) Howell, of Adrian, Mich.; married Alice Chase Cullingham, of Omaha; civil engineer; attended public schools in Adrian, Mich.; cadet midshipman, United States Navy, 1881; graduated United States Naval Academy, 1885; attended Detroit School of Law, 1892; State engineer of Nebraska, 1895–96; city engineer of Omaha, 1896–97; lieutenant, United States Navy, Spanish-American War; State senator, 1903–4; appointed to water board, metropolitan utilities district, Omaha; elected to board, 1904; reelected, 1910, 1916, 1922; Republican national committeeman, 1912; reelected, 1916, 1920; member executive committee, Republican National Committee, 1916–24; water commissioner, Omaha, 1912; Republican nominee for Governor, 1914; elected to United States Senate, 1922; reelected, 1928.

It was my privilege and opportunity to know Senator HOWELL during his lifetime. Before entering upon his duties as United States Senator, he was active in the municipal affairs of Omaha, Nebr., as well as in the affairs of the State government; and had strong convictions. He had the courage to advocate and defend his ideals, not only in private but in public affairs. Senator HOWELL died while holding office, March 11, 1933. He was a scholar and a man of vision, ability, and intellect, thoroughly versed in business affairs, and was popular with his fellow citizens. His death seemed untimely, and was a loss to his many friends, as well as to the State and Nation. I take this occasion to pay his memory a tribute of respect. His wife survives.

Mr. MOREHEAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following tribute to the late Senator HOWELL, of Nebraska, by Senator THOMPSON, of Nebraska:

When Senator ROBERT BEECHER HOWELL died, on March 11, 1933, he closed an enviable career of public service. His dominant mental characteristic, as estimated by those who worked with him and knew him intimately, was unselfishness. He was city-minded, State-minded, and Nation-minded. Further, he was naturally a persistent investigator in the economic field, never seeing in it any personal elements, but only those that were clothed with a public interest. It was never a question as to how he could obtain a personal profit, but how could a change be effected which would curb unfair advantage and relieve men and women from unnatural burdens, and bestow profits as nature's laws decreed. This fact showed itself in his earliest activities.

Coming to Nebraska in 1888, after having graduated as an engineer from the Naval Academy at Annapolis in 1885, he found a State whose western half was arid and semiarid; whose flowing streams were sufficient for but partial irrigation of these otherwise fertile lands; and whose legislature had failed to establish laws defining how these limited waters could be appropriated. It is not inaccurate to say that one more selfish-minded of this acquisitive era, finding such facts, and realizing the attendant opportunities, would have embarked upon a plan for a large corporation, an accumulation of thousands of arid acres and actual appropriation of the use of these waters before the legislature should act. Not so with ROBERT BEECHER HOWELL. By seeming intuition he saw the picture of these lands and these waters controlled for the benefit of the small tillers of the soil. He secured the position of State engineer, and personally investigated their location, their courses and their present usefulness. He traveled to other States, investigated their irrigation systems and their laws relevant thereto. Then he became a member of the State senate, and through his leadership the legislature passed an act which he proposed, and thereby he became, in fact, the father of the first irrigation law of his adopted State.

Then, as related by his Omaha fellow workers, some years later, while Omaha's city engineer, he penetrated the subterranean passages of the Omaha Water Co., a private corporation controlled from the Atlantic seaboard. He saw profits accruing to such company were far out of proportion to the capital invested in the enterprise. This was at the noonday of reorganizations and combinations. But to personal profit he gave no thought. His picture was of the water users—the city included—paying an inequitable, illogical, abnormal price for water, and of a stream of unmeasured dollars flowing across the city's boundary to the company's offices in the city of New York. He began to plan a way to stop this stream and to relieve the water users from overpayment. He talked of it by day and dreamed of it by night. It became a part of his being. His purpose required an act of the legislature amending the city charter so as to permit the city to acquire the plant by private bargaining or by eminent domain. How should this be accomplished? He would go to the legislature. He would have greater voice in the senate. He would go to the senate.

It was in the days of nomination by convention. As the legend runs, the Republican city central committee promised him that if he would bring in the delegation from his ward (the third), he could have the nomination. This promise was lightly made, they not believing the condition possible of fulfillment. The night of the primaries, ROBERT BEECHER HOWELL appeared at headquarters and reported that the condition was fulfilled.

The chairman, with different arrangements already made, suggested that a newcomer should not expect to run for the Senate; that he could have the nomination for the house. Mr. HOWELL withdrew from the interview disillusioned, disappointed, angry; and with two additional prominent traits of his character in the foreground—persistence which knew no limits and an enthusiasm which never failed. Thus he went out into the night to continue his fight. Before next day's sun rose over the Iowa bluffs, he had seen the leading spirit of nearly every ward and had concluded working agreements. The newcomer had broken the machine. A few days later he was nominated for the senate and in the fall elected with a good majority.

But he had not reached his goal. The water company was not without influence, and the Howell water bill was defeated. But the idea, the hope, the longing, were not defeated but intensified. Two years later Mr. HOWELL was again back in the senate, and before the session's end the second Howell water bill had become a law. And then he fought on and on. In the next city election the people adopted his plan. Bonds were provided. Then court struggles ensued. But in the end the city became the owner of the water plant. Mr. HOWELL had become known, trusted, respected. Without his really knowing it, his political career had begun.

How sound were his views was demonstrated from the very first. Water rates were cut and large surpluses reserved for payment on bonds previously issued. Then he was himself called upon to take the position of general manager of the plant. So successful was the plant, the electors supported him in the establishment of a metropolitan utilities district and in adding an ice plant and a gas plant to its ownership. Mr. HOWELL's idea and his service to the people of Omaha in carrying it out have already netted them millions of dollars, and this net will be increased year by year so long as the people of Omaha preserve those rights which he won for them by long, unceasing, intelligent labor. What greater monument could man have!

He was frank and truthful and entirely free from that cowardice which breeds deception. He was sincere in his beliefs; he was faithful to his word, and he was loyal to every cause that he espoused. He was free from narrow partisanship and enjoyed to the fullest extent the confidence and esteem of Democrats as well as Republicans. There was no sham or hypocrisy in his character. He was always frank, cordial, and courteous. In the study of economic questions he took special delight. He had decided convictions on every moral question and never hesitated to declare them in a modest way when the occasion demanded. Thus he became a recognized leader in progressive thought and action.

By his consistent and unwavering fight for municipal ownership, he gained and retained the confidence of the active business voters all over the State, this largely through his insistence that municipal ownership should be applied where that which was a natural monopoly was abusing its privilege or when a monopoly in business was operating without regard to the rights of others engaged in the same line of business and to the injury of the general public. While he was not what would be called a partisan in politics, he always retained his alinement with and in the Republican Party. Yet when a candidate, he carried with him voters of all parties. In his campaigns his appeal was to the voters generally and not specifically. His plan was for a cause and not for a party. I remember the first time I ever heard him. It was on an evening after I had my supper, and, as was my custom, I returned to my office in the second story of what then was known as the "Citizens National Bank"—raised my window overlooking the main street corner in Grand Island, Nebr., and soon I heard someone speaking; it was Mr. HOWELL.

I listened until the speech was finished. Then I went down and congratulated him. He asked how I liked his talk. I answered: "It was a very good Democratic speech—an appeal, however, without partisan bias, and if delivered to our Nebraska people generally, the Democrats will have to be mighty active if they want to beat you." To me, his best results were achieved in an open-air street-corner talk to the public. The common man believed in him and trusted him. No man could crave greater honor. As for myself, I felt highly honored when I was permitted to succeed him in the Senate. His adopted city of Omaha and the State that he honored in every position he filled will all down through the coming years remember him and profit by his labors.

Mr. MOREHEAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following tribute to the late Senator HOWELL, of Nebraska, by Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD, of Texas:

The passing of ROBERT BEECHER HOWELL affords just occasion for the remark that if every American citizen possessed the ideals and pursued them with the energies that animated him, this Republic and its liberties would be secure. I base this assertion on intimate personal and official association with him for more than 2 decades. American history does not present an instance of more complete and disinterested devotion to the universal good than that his life exemplified.

With him the supreme test of every public question was its bearing on the general welfare. In fact this view was more than an abstract belief so far as he was concerned. It assumed the proportions of a faith, a passion in the purest and most uplifting sense. He fought with unsurpassed tenacity and intensity every endeavor of special and selfish interests to obtain unfair advantages or to establish corrupt and despotic power. In the service of the people he was a soldier whose armor was never off. His heart and soul were enlisted with his brain in the struggle of the weak against the strong; and the determination, the ability, and the devotion with which he stood against the predatory forces of society should stand out in grateful memory of all Americans as an inspiring and perpetual example.

I knew him best as a prohibitionist, an opponent of the traffic in intoxicating liquors. Recognizing in that traffic a menace to human happiness, a threat to freedom of opportunity and of progress, he threw himself into the fight against it with a vigor and an effectiveness unsurpassed in American annals. Any record of the resistance in the United States to this fundamental evil would be incomplete without mention of his efforts. He believed that liberty should be defined in terms of human welfare, that the rights of dependent ones, for instance, to a decent and comfortable existence were superior to the so-called "right" of an individual to drink intoxicating liquor.

His ability to locate and to assemble facts, a faculty all too rare and far too little cultivated, enabled him to contribute observations of profound value to any discussion in which he participated. Whether the subject was that of world financial obligations or the complicated rate structures of public utilities it remained for him above all others to supply a factual foundation involving tremendous labor, keenest discrimination, and an invincible patience. On the basis of the practical he developed his contentions and convictions, and in support of these he exhibited a militancy, a fearlessness, a sincerity, and an integrity which won the praise and respect of all.

He would never compromise his conception of the right, the just, the true. Most vividly did his attitude of opposition to what in his view was error or was wrong suggest classic examples of adherence to duty at any cost.

On the summit of the castle of St. Angelo at Rome stands the bronze figure of an angel with uplifted sword. During one of the fiercest French-Italian wars this castle had been captured by a small force of Frenchmen who were soon surrounded by the enemy in overwhelming numbers. Exhibiting the sublimest courage, the beleaguered Frenchmen resisted siege and charge for many days. It became at last apparent that their destruction was inevitable. Prompted by admiration for such valor, the enemy's commander suspended battle and summoned the French captain to surrender. "We will surrender", the brave French captain thundered in reply, "when the bronze angel sheaths its sword."

With similar courage and determination ROBERT BEECHER HOWELL faced all the problems and responsibilities which confronted him throughout his remarkable career.

Mr. MOREHEAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following tribute to the late ROBERT BEECHER HOWELL by Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS, of Nebraska:

ROBERT BEECHER HOWELL was born in Adrian, Mich., January 21, 1864. He was educated in the public schools of that city, was appointed cadet midshipman to the United States Naval Academy in 1881, and was graduated from the Naval Academy in 1885. He located in Omaha, Nebr., in 1888, and attended the Detroit School of Law in 1892. He became State engineer of Nebraska in 1895, and in 1896 served as city engineer of Omaha.

Senator HOWELL served in the Spanish-American War as a lieutenant in the United States Navy. He served one term in the Nebraska State Senate (1903–4). Here he was instrumental in securing the passage through the legislature of a law providing for the establishment of the Metropolitan Utilities District of Omaha. After his retirement from the Nebraska Legislature in 1904, he was selected as manager of the Metropolitan Utilities District, and was reelected to that position in 1910, 1916, and 1922.

Senator HOWELL led the fight which resulted in the taking-over of the waterworks in Omaha, which city was then being supplied with water by a private company. This fight lasted for many years and was finally settled by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. The attempt of the Omaha Water Co., during the great business depression of 1896, to acquire what was practically a perpetual franchise to supply the city of Omaha with water, precipitated a fight for public ownership. Elected to the State senate in 1902, Senator HOWELL led the fight to compel the council of the city of Omaha to obey the mandate of the people, to buy the Omaha water plant, and secured the enactment of a law compelling the city council to take such action. In addition, this law provided for an unusual form of organization for the control and operation of any public utilities which might thereafter be acquired by the city of Omaha. This organization was the metropolitan utilities district, governed by a board of six directors, which is empowered to choose its own chairman and general manager.

In 1912, after a contest covering 16 years, Omaha's water plant was taken over by the city at a cost of $6,500,000, after the question had been finally settled by the Supreme Court of the United States. In 1917, authority was granted by the legislature to go into the ice business, and, in 1920, the gas plant of the Omaha Gas Co. was acquired at a cost of about $5,000,000.

From 1913 until 1924, during all but 4 years of which period the Metropolitan Utilities District was under the managership of Senator HOWELL, the water plant made eight different reductions in rates charged the consumer, in all reducing the cost through public ownership 52½ percent. The ice plant, built at a cost of approximately $700,000, with a capacity of 200 tons per day and long storage capacity of 29,000 tons of ice, over a 5-year period, on the basis of 30 cents per hundred, paid for itself, with the exception of $138,000 of the original cost. The gas plant, taken over in 1920, under the management of Mr. HOWELL, made a remarkable record, and in a 3-year period accumulated a reserve of $2,378,000. These accomplishments were brought about by Omaha, when the city took the first steps in public ownership under the leadership of Senator HOWELL.

The remarkable success of Senator HOWELL in the management and control of these public utilities had an indirect effect far greater than is indicated by the above figures. He not only improved the quality of the gas and the purity of the water supplied to the people of Omaha; he not only broke the back of the Ice Trust, which had theretofore charged exorbitant rates; in addition, he created a sentiment in favor of public ownership of public utilities. The success of the public ownership of water, gas, and ice aroused public interest in favor of the public ownership of the generation and distribution of electricity. This resulted directly in the reduction of electric-light rates from 14 cents per kilowatt-hour to 5½ cents per kilowatt-hour, thus saving millions of dollars to the consumers of electricity. Although the activities of Senator HOWELL did not result in the construction of an electric-light plant, yet the very threat of such a public ownership brought about this great reduction. He became an outstanding figure in the State of Nebraska in favor of municipal ownership of all public utilities. His reputation in this respect was given great consideration by the voters of Nebraska and was one of the material factors in his subsequent nomination and election to the United States Senate.

In a State-wide primary he was elected Republican national committeeman in 1912. He was reelected to this position in 1916 and again in 1920. He was a member of the Republican National Committee from 1916 until 1924. In 1914 he was nominated as the Republican candidate for Governor of Nebraska but was defeated in the November election.

During the World War Senator HOWELL was a Reserve officer in the United States Navy and served in this capacity from 1917 until 1921. He was chairman of the radio service commission of the Post Office Department in 1921. He was nominated in a State-wide primary and elected to the office of United States Senator in 1922. He was renominated and reelected in 1928 for the term beginning March 4, 1929. While serving his second term as Senator from Nebraska, he died at Walter Reed Hospital in Washington, D.C., March 11, 1933.

Senator HOWELL was one of the most useful and valuable public servants ever to serve in the United States Senate. He was universally respected in that body by both friend and foe. Personally, he was a lovable character, with a courage that was unsurpassed. He did not hesitate to uphold and defend what he believed to be right, regardless of consequences. In politics, he was absolutely independent—he knew no master other than his own conscience. His intimate knowledge of public-utility questions from an engineering standpoint gave him a commanding influence in the United States Senate. Every Member of that body was always willing to take Senator HOWELL'S conclusions without fear of being wrong. He solved every problem with mathematical accuracy, and his deductions of facts and figures were never once overthrown and very seldom even questioned.

During his long public service in behalf of his adopted city of Omaha, the State of Nebraska, and the Nation, the finger of scorn was never once pointed in his direction. His entire life was marked with distinguished ability, honesty, and courage unsurpassed. His death came as a shock to all lovers of better government and improved conditions. His life is a shining light upon the road of human progress.

PORTER HINMAN DALE

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, tributes to the distinguished service rendered by the Honorable PORTER H. DALE in the Congress of the United States will be appropriately and adequately paid today by those whose pleasure, privilege, and good fortune it was to have been associated with him in the Halls of the House and Senate.

I come as a personal friend of long years' standing, as well as the representative of the people he served so faithfully, so illustriously, to pay to his memory their heartfelt, though brief, tribute, and my own.

He was elected to the Sixty-fourth Congress to succeed my father, who was not a candidate for reelection. Chosen, thereafter, by the people of the Second District of Vermont to represent them in successive sessions of Congress, he resigned during the Sixty-eighth Congress in order to become a successful candidate for election to the United States Senate, thereby filling the vacancy caused by the death of the late Senator William P. Dillingham.

Although advised that he was not in the best of health, we were not prepared for the tragic news of his death, which came to all as a shock, bringing home to each of us a distinct realization of the magnitude of the loss we, and the State of Vermont, had sustained. We have come to know with what fine courage he fought unflinchingly against the ill health that beset him, while he bore without complaint the burdens and until the end faithfully and unceasingly discharged the duties imposed upon him by his office.

It is superfluous to suggest that the people of Vermont believed in PORTER H. DALE. They felt that he was one of them. No one ever questioned his sincerity of purpose. Constantly loyal, his warm, friendly, and sympathetic nature won and kept for him the friendship of those thousands in the Green Mountains of Vermont who join with me today as we mourn the passing of the man. A gentleman of high ideals, he met the test of the high offices he held both courageously and well, and was held in the highest regard by all his colleagues.

His honesty of purpose, his fairness to others, the zealousness, enthusiasm, loyalty and intelligence with which he espoused the cause he chose to champion, won for him the confidence, respect, and esteem of his friends and acquaintances and made him a respected adversary in legislative controversies in these Halls. Of pleasing and prepossessing personality, he was a delightful and congenial companion. The circle in which he moved is forever broken.

His passing was a distinct loss, not only to the people of the State of Vermont but to the Nation.

His life, character, and public service, not to be lightly treasured, should constitute examples to be emulated, offer an inspiration to us all, and provide his enduring monument.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following biographical sketch of the late Senator PORTER H. DALE, by Senator WARREN R. AUSTIN, of Vermont:

Senator PORTER HINMAN DALE, who died in Westmore, Vt. October 6, 1933, had served as a Member of the National House of Representatives for 8½ years and as a Member of the United States Senate for 10 years.

Senator DALE was born at Island Pond, Essex County, Vt., March 1, 1867, son of George Needham Dale and Helen Hinman Dale. He attended the public schools and seminary at Montpelier, Vt., and after 2 years in the West, returned to study with private instructors in Boston and Philadelphia. He was principal of the Green Mountain Seminary at Waterbury, Vt., and left to become the first instructor in elocution at Bates College at Lewiston, Maine. For 2 years he was associated with the Shakespearean scholar and actor, James E. Murdoch. He studied law and was admitted to the Vermont bar in 1896, commencing practice at Island Pond with his father. In 1900 he was admitted to practice before the United States courts.

Senator Dale was deputy collector of customs at Island Pond from 1897 to 1910. He served as colonel on the staff of Gov. Josiah Grout from 1896 to 1898. He was twice chairman of the Republican State convention, once in 1898 and again in 1919, and was appointed judge of the Brighton Municipal Court by Gov. John A. Mead in 1910. He served in the State senate from 1910 to 1914.

Senator Dale married on June 1, 1891, Miss Amy K. Bartlett, of Island Pond, who died August 1, 1907. They had 2 sons and 2 daughters: Timothy C. Dale, George N. Dale, Mrs. Marian Dale Bennett, and Miss Amy Porter Dale. On June 25, 1910, he married Miss Augusta M. Wood, of Boston, Mass., who survives him.

Senator Dale was elected a Member of the Sixty-fourth, Sixty-fifth, Sixty-sixth, Sixty-seventh, and Sixty-eighth Congresses, serving in the House of Representatives from March 4, 1915, until August 11, 1923, when he resigned to become a candidate for the United States Senate.

Senator DALE was elected to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Senator William P. Dillingham to the United States Senate on November 7, 1923, for the term ending March 3, 1927. He was reelected in 1926 for the full term ending March 3, 1933, and in November 1932 was reelected for another 6-year term.

During his long service on Congress he was a member of many important committees, and, before the change in administration in 1933, was on both the Appropriations and Rules Committees.

Senator DALE, who had had long experience in the Customs Service, was instrumental in formulating legislation for the betterment of employees in the classified service, and as chairman for many years of the Senate Committee on Civil Service was especially active in securing the passage of the Retirement Act now in operation. He also championed important legislation for postal employees.

One of the noblest traits of men who take part in the advocacy of great controversial principles is fidelity to a cause. This virtue animated Senator PORTER H. DALE. As history speaks with venerable accent, his steadfast, faithful, persistent advocacy of the rights and humane care of disabled veterans and their dependents will be lauded as a conspicuous example of his characteristic fidelity.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] relative to the life, character, and public service of the late Senator DALE, of Vermont.

On October 6, 1933, death called at the cottage of PORTER H. DALE. The grim messenger found him ready and fully prepared to go on the journey to the beyond.

After a busy and eventful life as a business man, lawyer, judge, member of the State house and senate, Member of the United States House of Representatives during five Congresses, three times elected to the United States Senate, a splendid citizen, a faithful public servant, a devoted and loving husband and father, he was prepared, as few are, to receive the reward of his Master.

Intimately connected during 20 years of public life, I felt keenly a sense of personal loss in his passing. As his successor, his excellent qualities will always be before me as a guide for a continuance of the type of service he gave to the State and Nation.

It is difficult to portray by the written word his many splendid qualities. The secret of his success is not difficult to find, however, because his character was the basis. He was strong in invincible religious faith, and success in material things had not dwarfed his spiritual stature. Senator DALE had a rich heritage in a long line of sturdy ancestors—the type of New England stock which is fast disappearing and which the Nation greatly stands in need of in these stressful days. PORTER DALE was a man among men whom the people of Vermont may well associate with the best the State has given, and our people can be justly proud not only of his many years of work but the kindly spirit and the sense of honor which dominated his life.

Senator DALE's outstanding characteristics were loyalty to his friends, devotion to his work, and honesty of his convictions. Few men in public life in Vermont have had so strong a personal following. This was undoubtedly true because he learned the feeling of the rank and file of all people—the high and the low, the rich and the poor; because he did not capitalize friendship for political advancement and because he never deserted his friends but rather stood with them, until, in his unselfish way, he had helped them to the utmost of his ability. Because of his sincere, sympathetic interest, his approachability, his patience, and his desire to bring happiness to others he was firmly entrenched in the affection of those with whom he came in contact.

Senator DALE was devoted to his work, and his record in the Senate was one of full performance of duty—a continuance of the same type of diligent, sincere effort which marked his years in the House of Representatives. He was a tireless worker to the end that the interests of his fellow citizens and the welfare of his country might be safeguarded. He was a successful representative of the people because he really served them. His constituents knew that when he made a promise he kept it, and he pleased them with actual accomplishment. His career in Congress resembled his career outside of it; that is, it was one of quiet work and effective performance. He worked conscientiously and unassumingly, not raising his eyes for the applause that might have come had he chosen to make known his many works. His life was not spectacular, but he was even greater than those who stood in the limelight.

Senator DALE had the courage of his convictions, and it cannot be said that his people were in doubt about his position. He had no misgivings of purpose, and his unswerving faith in a cause he believed to be right led to sharp criticism, but his opponents or criticism never caused him to deviate from his duty or dislodge him from what he believed was for the best of all. Political pressure or expediency did not cause him to waver. He did not fall into the popular march of issues for popularity's sake. It may well be said that he gained strength to defend a cause from the rugged hills of his State and was fortified by a deep consciousness that many would benefit by his position. And his opponents as well as his friends respected his sincerity. He died as he lived, true to the principles in which he believed.

Senator DALE was a particularly loyal worker in all problems concerning those who have followed our country's flag, and he gave conspicuous service in behalf of the veterans of all wars. He also championed the cause of the Federal employees and fought with determination and zeal for legislation which he believed would benefit those of the Government's service.

Among the resolutions adopted is the following from the Vermont State Committee of the Republican Party:

"We realize the loss of a man whose love of country was paramount to party or policy; whose life was permeated by a fixity of conviction and unquestioned integrity; whose vision was unclouded; whose understanding spirit embraced the needs of all people, and whose time and energy were dedicated to a life of notable service for the people of his State."

Upon his death a friend well said of him:

"PORTER HINMAN DALE was an untiring worker, a devoted American, a loyal friend, and a true Christian gentleman. He knew the art of friendship because he really cared for all people. He added beauty and refinement to the common touch and particularly enjoyed helping ordinary folks, ever giving them new hope and joy. Those who were in need seemed to mean more to him than those who were fortified by position or wealth.

"His patience was unfailing. He was a cheerful donor of his time and energy, taking infinite pains with the small as well as with the larger problems with which he was intrusted.

"His life was rich in rare honesty and was strengthened by unhindered courage. Because of the steadfastness of his beliefs he was enabled to make the noblest use of his position, and he rested quietly in the abiding faith that he was right."

Not long before his passing he went with his devoted wife to his summer cottage, high up in the hills of his beloved State. There he had on many occasions sought peace and rest from his arduous duties. We may well honor and respect the man who loves and longs for those beautiful quiet places which seem a part of the eternal.

He held the respect of his colleagues to a remarkable degree. Of him Senator KENNETH MCKELLAR recently said:

"I considered Senator DALE, of Vermont, one of the finest men it was ever my privilege to know. He was clean, high-minded, honorable, and a man of unusual ability.

"Before Senator DALE and I were in the Senate, we served together in the House. We were on two committees together. In the committee, on the floor, in all of his personal and official dealings, and in his private contacts he was always the same—generous, gentlemanly, and a whole-souled man. While he and I differed politically, he honored me with his friendship, and I entertained for him the highest affection.

"It is a source of the greatest satisfaction that I have been given the privilege of saying these few words of him."

Senator J. G. TOWNSEND, Jr., of Delaware, paid the following tribute:

"It is a privilege to pay tribute to the memory of my departed colleague, the late Senator PORTER H. DALE. He was an able Senator and a gentleman, loyal and unassuming. His family and his constituents have much for which to be grateful in the service that he rendered."

Senator LESTER J. DICKINSON, of Iowa, expressed his appreciation of Senator DALE as follows:

"It was my privilege to serve with Senator PORTER H. DALE for many years as a Member of the House and for a number of years as a Member of the Senate.

"Senator DALE was a most conscientious public servant. He was aggressive when the interest of his State was involved. One of his outstanding characteristics was his trend toward all humanitarian matters. He was always most interested in that which was for the common good. It is pleasing to know that a proper memorial is to be published in his behalf."

JOHN BENJAMIN KENDRICK

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Mr. Speaker, no words of mine can adequately and fully describe the high esteem in which Senator KENDRICK was held by all who knew him. It is said the richest possession a person may acquire is the confidence, respect, and esteem of our friends and acquaintances. Senator KENDRICK had all of these, and his memory is enshrined in the hearts of the people of his State, of his former colleagues, and his host of friends in Washington and throughout the country.

We mourn the loss of a man of fine character, of a friendly, gentle nature, a man of broad human sympathy, whose heart was full of love and charity for his fellow men.

Senator KENDRICK was an ardent champion of whatever cause he espoused. He was straightforward, courageous, and honest in his views—an interesting speaker, and his direct and forceful presentation of any subject carried conviction and always commanded the respect and attention of his audience.

Senator KENDRICK was born in Cherokee County, Tex., September 6, 1857. He was educated in the public schools; went to Wyoming in 1879 and engaged in stock growing, which business he followed until his death. He was elected State senator in 1910 and served in the eleventh and twelfth State legislatures. He was elected Governor in 1914 and served with distinction until February 1917, resigning to take his seat in the United States Senate. He was reelected to the United States Senate in 1922, and again in 1928. He died November 3, 1933.

The close intimacies of the common efforts of the Wyoming delegation in Congress make for friendships based upon respect and recognition of the finest elements of human character. By every test of such friendships Senator KENDRICK measured to the full stature of a man.

He will always live in the hearts of those with whom he was associated. To them he needs no other monument. The influence which he exerted out of his wide experience, sound judgment, and inflexible character will live on in the structure of our Government. His personality is the heritage which will be treasured in the memory of his friends and associates.

Senator KENDRICK died in the harness, working long and hard for his folks in Wyoming. And now his spirit is free to return to the land he loved—the land of which he was so much a part—the West.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement of Hon. ROBERT D. CAREY, United States Senator from the State of Wyoming:

REMARKS OF THE HONORABLE ROBERT D. CAREY, UNITED STATES SENATOR, AT THE MEMORIAL SERVICES FOR THE LATE SENATOR JOHN B. KENDRICK ON APRIL 27

Senator KENDRICK represented the very highest type of Wyoming pioneer. Coming from Texas to Wyoming as a cowboy, following a trail herd of cattle, he became through his own perseverance and industry the outstanding citizen of this State. He had little schooling, but by constant study he educated himself. With no financial backing but through thrift and hard work, he built up a large and successful business.

Two factors contributed to his success: First, his determination was unyielding once he made up his mind. Second, a personality which enabled him to make friends. He had a charm which made everyone who knew him not only like him but desire to comply with his requests.

No man was held in greater esteem in the Senate than JOHN B. KENDRICK. The friendships he established, together with his determination and persistence, made it possible for him to accomplish much in Congress.

Senator KENDRICK never failed to realize that what might be looked upon as a small matter in Washington might be of great importance to some citizen of Wyoming. While he always gave careful attention to national affairs, he never neglected his constituents or their requests. When he called at a department, he saw not only the head of the office but made friends with every clerk and employee; and on account of their liking for him there was always a desire to do what he asked.

My relations with him were most pleasant. We conferred and worked together. I went to him many times for advice, which he was always willing to give, and which was most helpful.

There has never been anyone in public life in Wyoming who has been held in greater esteem and affection by the people. Having reached such an influential position in the Senate, his death is a serious loss to the State. He will be missed by many, not only as an outstanding citizen but as a friend.

I am including as a part of my address the following tribute to Senator KENDRICK, by W. C. Deming, publisher of the leading newspaper of Wyoming:

"JOHN B. KENDRICK, THE MAN AND THE STATESMAN—A TRIBUTE TO LATE WYOMING SENATOR BY PUBLISHER OF STATE'S LEADING NEWSPAPER

"The history of the world is, after all, largely a chronicle of the affairs and achievements of men and women. Otherwise, books would be stale and uninteresting and the record of mankind dull beyond endurance.

"The life of the late United States Senator JOHN B. KENDRICK, of Wyoming, needs no encomium. His career speaks for itself and in language more forceful and fascinating than any artist, author, or orator could depict, outline, or construct.

"However, for the benefit of those who may not be altogether familiar with the circumstances, incidents, events, and accomplishments which enter into the life and success of our honored and departed friend, I shall attempt to condense them and present them this evening.

"JOHN B. KENDRICK was born September 6, 1857, in Cherokee County, Tex. The very name of the county in which he first saw the light of day suggests the pioneer history and surroundings of that section of the country. He was the son of John Harvey and Anna Maye Kendrick.

"The tendency among many boys to inherit or follow the occupation and chief interest of the father, whether in business or a profession, is exemplified in the case of young KENDRICK. His parents were cattle ranchers in a small way, and thus he came naturally by his familiarity with boots, spurs, chaps, sombrero, quirt, and Texas saddle, all so necessary to the equipment of the cowboy on the range.

"Fortunately, for young KENDRICK there was an old-fashioned public school at Florence, Williamson County, and he availed himself of six or seven grades, so called, before going out into the world for himself. This occurred in his sixteenth year, and soon he was 'riding trail' over long distances with the oldest and best of them.

"In those days it was customary to drive thousands of cattle many miles from winter range to summer range, from a short-grass to a long-grass country, or in periods of drought, to a section, territory, or State where Providence had smiled more benignly upon man and beast.

"What opportunities for meditation and contemplation! Young JOHN B. KENDRICK did not stop merely with his musings or his wonderment at the procession of seasons or the precise movement of the stars and the planets, as he observed them during his lonely vigils when 'riding herd' upon the plains.

"He carried or borrowed books and little by little added to his store of knowledge, something he early realized would be of much value if his sphere of activities were ever measurably enlarged or enhanced.

"Perhaps it would not be an exaggeration to paraphrase Whittier in the Branded Hand when he said:

"'In thy lone and long night-watches,
Sky above and "earth" below,
Thou didst learn a higher wisdom
Than the babbling schoolmen know.'

"Thus in March 1879, at the age of 22, he began his long trek northward, one of many Texas cowboys driving a herd of 3,000 cattle from Matagorda Bay on the Gulf of Mexico to the Running Water range in northeastern Wyoming.

"The distance was 1,500 miles, and the journey over rough roads and dusty, unbroken trails took 5 months. He arrived on August 27, 1879.

"While in this day and age, with modern transportation, one may cover that distance in 3 or 4 days by motor or in a half day by flying machine, in 1879 it was a long journey and replete with more risks and dangers from Indians, floods, droughts, accidents, or disease than a trip around the world would be today.

"Young KENDRICK experienced two narrow escapes before reaching Wyoming: one, when a large band of horses broke corral in a storm at night and stampeded, but, fortunately, the frightened animals jumped as neatly over the sleeping cow punchers as if taking hurdles at a modern horse show; the second, when as a result of fever, JOHN KENDRICK calmly advised his fellow cowboys to bury him beneath the virgin sod and complete their errand to Wyoming if he should not recover.

"His employer, upon that first journey from Texas north, was Charles W. Wulfjen, a successful cattleman who was moving his herds and his residence to this State.

"Apparently the youthful cowboy, who had recovered his health and strength, made such an impression upon his employer for industry, intelligence, and fidelity that he became foreman of the Wulfjen ranch in Wyoming, a position he held for 5 years. However, a man of JOHN B. KENDRICK's temperament could not be satisfied to work for another.

"Moreover, that fifteen-hundred-mile journey through a country in which there were few settlers and often no livestock convinced him that the opportunity of which he had dreamed was all about him and beckoned with a welcoming hand.

"Therefore, he returned to Texas in 1883 and invested his savings, less than $200, in a small herd of long-horned cattle, and trailed them back to Wyoming, with cattle of his employer, where he enjoyed the thrill of establishing his own ranch, recording his own brand, and becoming a cattleman in his own right and name.

"The Wulfjen and the Kendrick holdings were on Lance Creek in Converse County.

"So rapidly did the young Texan make a place for himself in Wyoming that in 1885 he became foreman of the Lance Creek Cattle Co., in which he had an interest. He was range manager of the Converse Cattle Co. from 1887 to 1897, which company he took over, acquiring real estate, herds, and brands.

"During a considerable part of this time the Wulfjen family resided in Cheyenne in winter and on the Converse County ranch in summer. Thus they all had a large acquaintance in those days in southeastern Wyoming.

"An early Wulfjen home ranch in Wyoming was named the ULA, in honor of Eula Wulfjen.

"How much inspiration for Senator KENDRICK's knowledge and success resulted from the influence of that splendid lady, I shall not pretend to say; but having known JOHN B. KENDRICK for more than 20 years and appreciating the value he placed upon the finer things of life, my impression is that he gave to her the greater credit for all the happiness and success that had come to him.

"At any rate, his life story recalls that while he was riding the range by day and reading his books and papers by a dim kerosene lamp at night, his mind wandered to the home of his former employer and associate.

"The interest and admiration he experienced were mutual, and on January 20, 1891, he was married to Miss Eula Wulfjen, who, with her fine son, Manville Kendrick, and her charming daughter, Rosa-Maye Harmon, survive him.

"Year by year the range was becoming overcrowded; and as JOHN KENDRICK's herds increased, it was necessary to acquire new holdings. He did the obvious, fitting, and proper thing in purchasing the remnant and the brands of the O W ranch, in the vicinity of Sheridan, formerly the home of his first employer and now one of the outstanding cattle estates in the entire West, in the management of which his brother-in-law, Clarence Wulfjen, participated.

"While he had become the big boss and the leading citizen of a wide area in northern Wyoming and southern Montana, Mr. KENDRICK was up with the sun and made a full hand at anything there was to be done. No cowpuncher could outride him, no neighboring ranchman could vie with him in the amenities that characterize a pleasant gentleman and a royal host. Such qualities and such elements of superiority do not come by chance.

"Henry W. Longfellow must have envisioned JOHN B. KENDRICK or known his like when the poet said:

"'The heights by great men reached and kept
Were not attained by sudden flight,
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward in the night.'

"Intelligence and industry bring their own reward.

"The quality of his herds improved. He became an authority on livestock, the economic use of ditches and available water supply, cattle disease, and marketing. So much so, indeed, that the O W ranch and its owner were noted in all the great Northwest territory. He became president of the Wyoming Stock Growers Association in 1909, serving 4 years, also vice president of the National Livestock Association for 5 years."

Yet, as recently as 1910, Mr. KENDRICK was unknown as a political figure. That year he was induced by the people of Sheridan County to become a candidate for the State senate. His election followed by a flattering majority. I recall almost as if it were yesterday my first meeting with the plain, tall, bronzed but genial Democratic senator from Sheridan County. Without art or effort, he left an impression upon any or all who spent as much as 1 hour in his presence.

The foundation of his remarkable political career was laid in that session of the legislature in the month of January and February 1911. As has been well said, due to his personality, geniality, sincerity, and quick understanding of men and measures, he emerged a figure, destined to take a place among the outstanding statesmen in Wyoming and in the Nation.

"The minority party literally drafted him as a candidate for United States Senator in 1913, to oppose Hon. Francis E. Warren. While friends of these two self-made citizens permitted some bitterness to enter into the contest, the principals kept themselves upon a high plane and the "green cowpuncher", as State senator KENDRICK called himself, always referred with much respect to his distinguished opponent, who even then was a leader in the United States Senate.

Senator Warren was reelected, securing a majority in a joint session of the legislature, that election being in the days before the popular election of United States Senators.

The campaign, however, had placed the Sheridan citizen upon the map, so to speak, and he was the logical candidate of his party for Governor in 1914. His election was a triumph and marked the beginning of a real opportunity for broad, practical achievement in State and National affairs. I well remember the graciousness of Governor and Mrs. Kendrick and their interesting children at the inaugural ball, in which defeated partisans participated enthusiastically.

Governor KENDRICK lost no opportunity to drive home the fact that he was the chief executive of the State, a servant of all the people, not a mere representative of a political party.

Henceforward there was no election in which he was a candidate in which he did not secure a following from all political parties and from all walks of life. As I have often remarked, while fate and circumstances, and political training and obligation to those in my own party, placed me in opposition to Senator KENDRICK, there was never a time when I took any pleasure in working or voting against him.

Perhaps that was a reflex of Mr. KENDRICK's own feelings, because it has been said that if he ever hated his political enemies, he never showed it. After election the Republican seemed as welcome in his presence and in his office as the most rabid old-fashioned South Carolina Democrat.

Tolerance stood out conspicuously in his code of ethics and action.

Only a few months before his inauguration as Governor, following some good years in the cattle business, Mr. KENDRICK had completed his beautiful new home in Sheridan, on a hill overlooking that attractive little city, and that home is named "Trail End."

As he looked back to the decades that had elapsed since he began the long journey from the Rio Grande to the Black Hills and beyond, he, no doubt, felt that he had earned future years of rest and peace, minus the hardships of the range or the trials and exactions of public life.

But it was not to be. From his splendid private home, he came to occupy the new executive mansion in Cheyenne, where hospitality was extended to Democrat and Republican, high and low, rich and poor. Each and all in the presence of the "cowboy Governor" was made to feel perfectly at home.

Although wishing to serve out his 4-year term, Governor KENDRICK's name was written upon the ballot as the Democratic nominee for United States Senator in 1916. He made a vigorous campaign and defeated that scholarly gentleman and fine lawyer, the incumbent, Senator Clarence D. Clark, by 3,000 votes.

So great was Senator KENDRICK's modesty and so little inclined was he at any time to assume airs or a place or spurs that he had not actually won, that he sometimes spoke disparagingly of himself as a national lawmaker, and questioned whether he had really earned a right to occupy a seat in the great chamber where Webster and Hayne and Garfield and Blaine had held sway.

This man, whose political life began at 53, a time approaching the three-score line, after which most men begin to take things a bit easy and discount their own ability and judgment, performed his most arduous public duties and acquired a high place in the councils of the Nation.

The World War broadened his vision and his sympathies, extended his contacts and his activities. He was regarded by President Woodrow Wilson as a careful adviser and established himself in the hearts of his colleagues.

Reelected in 1922, he participated in the reconstruction years and worked with his senior colleague, Francis E. Warren, as if they were brothers in the same cause. Through his efforts Grand Teton National Park, of Wyoming, was established, a memorial to his name as long as those peaks endure.

Efforts to defeat him in 1928 failed, because the time had well arrived when he was regarded, like Senator Warren, as one of the venerable fathers and too valuable to be replaced upon political grounds.

Senator KENDRICK and President Calvin Coolidge always maintained a pleasant relationship. The same was true as to President Herbert Hoover, whom the Wyoming junior Senator had come to know during and after the World War, and while Mr. Hoover was Secretary of Commerce under President Coolidge.

Throughout this period, indulging the hope and the dream of a rich agricultural empire in central Wyoming, Senator KENDRICK never relaxed his efforts in behalf of the Alcova reclamation project.

At a time when engineers, specialists, writers, investigators, Cabinet heads, and Members of Congress were dismissing the proposition with a shrug of the shoulders, because of the expense of construction and the high price of water that would necessarily follow, Senator KENDRICK believed there was a way out.

His practical mind coupled with the project a great power dam which would supply electricity for farms, ranches, villages, towns, cities, mines, and possibly railroads within a radius of several hundred miles.

The election of Franklin D. Roosevelt in November 1932, together with a Congress of his own political persuasion, placed the now senior Senator from Wyoming in a position of new power and vantage.

With that energy and determination which had characterized his entire life, whether the task was large or small, he set about to realize his dream.

In the cloakroom, lobbies, corridors of the Capitol, and upon the floor of the Senate, he carried his message, strengthened by the fact that Wyoming through its oil royalties had contributed millions to the reclamation enterprises of other States.

His sincerity as to the desirability and practicability of the project, when judged over a period of 50 years, together with his mastery of the idea of fair play, carried conviction to his colleagues, to the Secretary of the Interior, and to the President of the United States.

* * * * * * *

Unexpectedly the message went forth a few months ago that the Casper-Alcova project had been approved and $23,000,000 would be appropriated for its completion.

It was a great victory.

But it is perhaps no exaggeration or forced tribute to Senator KENDRICK when I say that he paid for this achievement with his life.

Superimposed upon the multitudinous duties which encompass a United States Senator at all times, and the inescapable demands following a change of administration, the days and nights given to the Casper-Alcova project were too much, even for a man of Senator KENDRICK's physical and mental vigor.

Returning to Wyoming, he was acclaimed on every hand, and found that a movement had been inaugurated to make him the nominee of both major political parties in 1936.

While Senator KENDRICK honestly and sincerely hoped that he would be permitted to retire and enjoy his remaining years amidst his home and family, in the State he loved so well, in all probability had he survived, public sentiment and a high sense of duty on his part would have resulted in his reelection unanimously at the hands of the people of Wyoming.

In Sheridan, at the close of Congress, he still found much to do. What with the details of his large private business, ranching and banking, consultation over State and Federal matters of importance, and the exactions arising from the disposition of patronage, Senator KENDRICK had little or no time to himself, even in the supposed quiet of his own home.

Like a bolt of lightning from a clear sky, the news came on Wednesday evening, November 1, that Senator KENDRICK had suffered an attack from which he might not recover.

Anxious days and nights followed, in which thousands of men, women, and children watched the news bulletins and reports from his bedside, hoping almost against hope that the physical vigor which so often had stood him in good stead would again avail.

But it was not to be.

On Friday, November 3, 1933, the Senator passed away, not having recovered consciousness, and, therefore, having escaped the mental anxiety and physical pain which sometimes accompany the closing days of men and women who have passed three score and ten.

Notwithstanding the first severe storm of the winter season prevailed quite generally throughout Wyoming, by train, by automobile, by airship, friends and admirers came November 6 from every section, and some from long distances, to pay tribute to their departed friend.

In the privacy of that beautiful fireside, where he had planned to spend his declining days, the family gathered for the last opportunity to view and honor him who had been for so many years the rod and staff of the happy household.

Hundreds were gathered in the First Methodist Church, and literally thousands stood outside with bared heads, defying a bleak, chill November day as his remains were brought from the home, Trail End, for the public service.

Not the least impressive of the personal and official delegations gathered at the church was that of five Crow Indian chiefs in full tribal regalia. There they sat with solemn, bowed faces, doing their part with dignity in honoring their distinguished white brother whom they had come to know and honor as a close friend of the Great White Father in Washington.

In keeping with that modest, warm, personal, friendly spirit when he lived, Senator KENDRICK had often expressed the wish for a simple funeral, devoid of eulogy, but characterized by the hope and faith and beauty that emanate from the Holy Scripture.

There were old-time organ music and a verse of Crossing the Bar, a poem which became one of the Senator's favorites. This was read by Mrs. Clarence Wulfjen, sister-in-law of Mrs. John B. Kendrick, in lieu of the usual songs upon such an occasion.

In the midst of artistic banks of flowers, surrounding the altar and organ and reaching from the floor to the ceiling, the pastor Dr. I. B. Wood, of Cheyenne, former minister and personal friend of the deceased in Sheridan, assisted by the Reverend Charles E. Hardesty, now pastor of the Sheridan Methodist Church, conducted the service.

The ritual was brief and impressive in its simplicity and beauty. The biblical selections carried lessons of faith and cheer to all the assembled.

Perhaps, never before in Wyoming had so many people from every walk of life gathered to do honor to the dead. At the close of the ceremony and before those seated in the church were dismissed, the doors were opened and hundreds from the outside were permitted to walk through.

As the November sun was dropping down behind the Rocky Mountains, JOHN B. KENDRICK had moved from his temporal home at Trail End to the beautiful cemetery on Mount Hope where he now has peace and rest.

I regret that I never knew Senator KENDRICK during the days of his struggles. My acquaintance came at a period in his life when fortune had smiled and the future was large with honor and promise. He shared his material success with his neighbors and his friends. Parks, playgrounds, golf links, generous contributions to all public enterprises mark his citizenship.

To me, having watched Senator KENDRICK closely during the years of his political stewardship, I think the most impressive personal result was his growth as a public speaker.

All else that contributed to his value as a citizen, a chief executive, and legislator could be taken for granted.

Yet, practically without advanced schooling or training, upon occasion, when moved by his surroundings, he literally captivated an audience with his simple eloquence.

I shall recount but one incident. A few years ago while I was in Washington as president of the United States Civil Service Commission, Hon. Stephen J. Mather, Director of National Parks, issued invitations for a dinner at the Willard Hotel.

The list was confined almost exclusively to men who by reason of their past or present life, their official positions, private work or residence, would be interested in the growth and development of the National Park system.

There were about 60 present. Mr. Mather, the host, called upon each to rise and then gave a brief record of his career.

From the large list, three or four were chosen for extended remarks. The occasion had been a most happy one. Portly waiters in white jackets and spotless caps had carved immense helpings of buffalo steak from a nearby table in full sight of the guests.

It was in most ways a western occasion, although many easterners were present. In a measure, it was the crowning event of Stephen J. Mather's interest and achievements in behalf of national parks. The frontier was recalled and the future was rich with promise.

Senator KENDRICK's response was the speech of the evening. Briefly and effectively he recounted his boyhood, his early days upon the plains, and pictured for the benefit of the "tenderfeet" the herds of buffalo as he had seen them as a boy in his journey from Texas to Wyoming.

Coupled with that simple wit and humor with which he was so gifted, warmed with that smile which personified his friendliness, he drew the guests upon that occasion to him and with him as the old-fashioned horseshoe magnet attracts bits of steel.

Nothing I have said and nothing that we can now do will add to the fullness of Senator KENDRICK's life, an epic of the old and the new, the East and the West. These occasions are merely efforts on our own part to understand, if possible, and do honor to those who have so ably borne the burden and the heat of the day.

Shakespeare sums it all up in four words when he permits Hector to say: "The end crowns all."

CLAY STONE BRIGGS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, the sudden death of Hon. CLAY STONE BRIGGS, on April 29, 1933, was a profound shock not only to his family but to many thousands of people of Texas who knew him so well and so favorably, and who were the chief beneficiaries of the splendid public services he had rendered.

Judge BRIGGS was born in Galveston, and this beautiful island city was his home until the time of his death. He was brought up there under the most refining influences, and it was there that he received his early education and training that so eminently qualified him for the public positions he afterward filled with honor and distinction. First attending the public schools, he then entered the Ball High School, from which he was graduated in 1894. He attended the University of Texas in the academic department, going from there to Harvard for a session. In 1899 he graduated from the law department of Yale, with the degree of LL.B.

After returning from Yale Judge BRIGGS practiced law in Galveston for several years, and represented Galveston County in the thirtieth legislature, becoming identified with several of the most important laws enacted at that time. In 1909 he was appointed by the Governor of Texas as judge of the tenth judicial district, to which position he was reelected for three consecutive terms, resigning in January 1919 after his election to the Sixty-sixth Congress.

In Congress Judge BRIGGS was assigned to membership on the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries, taking an active interest in promoting and building up our merchant fleet, which is of such vital interest to the welfare of our Nation and particularly to that of his native State of Texas, whose foreign trade holds a very high rank among the States.

His public record, like his private life, is without stain or blemish. In my service in Congress I have never been associated with anyone who was more devoted to duty and to the interests of the country and of his constituency. He has left behind him a splendid record of achievement, as well as a host of sorrowing friends.

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the sudden and untimely passing of one of my closest and truest friends was such a shock that I am still, after all these months, at a loss to find words to adequately describe and express my deep sorrow.

CLAY STONE BRIGGS was truly a friend of the people of the Seventh Congressional District of Texas, and he remained loyal to all from the very day he first entered public life as a member of the Texas Legislature until God chose to call him on that beautiful spring morning of April 29, 1933. He had no warning, but we all know that he was not afraid to go. His whole life was devoted to comforting those about him and the people of his district. He gave his own welfare little thought. He was reticent and modest when his own well-being was involved; but when he was looking after the interest of one of his people, whether a man or woman of influence or a poverty-stricken farmer or laborer, he fought hard and effectively to protect the rights of his constituents.

His memory will forever linger in the hearts of the good people of Galveston and of east Texas who were so fortunate in having him represent them for many years, for all of us know that we could have chosen no man better equipped than this great humanitarian to serve us.

Soon after I landed in Galveston as a marine during the World War, I attended service at Grace Church. I met Judge BRIGGS there, and we immediately became warm friends. We cooperated in many problems, and many times I was amazed at his ability to take hold of a difficult matter, which often appeared hopeless, and after months of almost superhuman effort succeed. Mind you, he never gave a thought to anything material for himself. Late in the afternoon of the day before he passed on, he succeeded in obtaining a river-and-harbor project which meant a great deal to the people and commerce of his district. That was his last official act. Little did he know that when he would leave the Capitol that night, he would never see it again or his colleagues with whom he had served for so many years and whom he loved so dearly.

It seemed that his heart may have been burdened with sorrow, but he was every inch a gentleman; and if he had any misgivings, he carried them to his grave.

No nobler man ever lived on the face of the earth, and I know that God has rewarded him.

I want to incorporate in my address memorial resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives and Senate of the State of Texas soon after those two bodies learned of the passing of Judge BRIGGS:

PEAKE S. STEVENSON,
Speaker of the House.

I hereby certify that H.S.R. No. 157 was unanimously adopted by a rising vote on April 29, 1933.

LOUISE SNOW PHINNEY,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, for 10 years I served in the House with Hon. CLAY STONE BRIGGS, who had been elected a Member 2 years previous to the beginning of my service here.

He was a man of the highest ethical standards, honest, conscientious, and faithful in the discharge of duty. He had a bright, well-trained mind, having been graduated from the Ball High School in Galveston, and having attended the University of Texas, Harvard University, and was graduated from the law department of Yale University in 1899.

He had had 2 years' legislative experience in the Thirtieth Legislature of Texas and also served as district judge of the Tenth Judicial District of Texas for more than 10 years. With this background he had excellent training for the experience so necessary for his service in Congress, and the splendid record which he made here was doubtless due thereto.

No Member was more jealous of the rights of his constituents and served them more faithfully than CLAY STONE BRIGGS. Galveston and other counties in his district now have Federal projects which came by reason of his untiring efforts. Almost daily he visited the various departments of the Government; and by personal contact, a pleasing personality, and his legal ability he was able to secure favorable action upon many applications which otherwise would have been denied.

He was a member of the important Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries, was constant in his attendance upon the sessions of the House, manifested an interest in all bills of major importance, and was always well informed as to the provisions of legislation; and all his votes were intelligently cast.

His death was sudden and unexpected. He participated in proceedings of the House the day before. I talked with him late in the afternoon preceding his passing early the following morning, and he was apparently in good health and in excellent spirits.

CLAY STONE BRIGGS enjoyed the confidence and esteem of the entire Membership of the House, both Democrats and Republicans. He was my friend, and I had for him an affectionate regard. In his death the Seventh Congressional District of Texas, the State of Texas, and the Nation at large lost a faithful, able, and conscientious servant of the people.

CHARLES HILLYER BRAND

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, when I first became a Member of Congress, there came at the same time, as a Representative from the State of Georgia, the Honorable CHARLES H. BRAND, and he served in this body continuously until his death. Our friendship began with our early acquaintance, and my respect and affection for him and his many good qualities never abated at any moment.

Judge BRAND, as many of us knew him, was one of life's jewels. He embodied the highest principles of life, and to acknowledge and know him as a friend was to bring to one's self an honor.

He was strong in his convictions, taking at all times that view which he believed to be honorable and right. He was just in a very high degree. His judicial service in his own State of Georgia could not have been other than of a very high order; like his service here in Congress, it must have been full of real faithful and honest service. Judge BRAND was a true and loyal friend; he was so true and loyal that an injustice or injury to his friend was, according to his standard, an injustice and injury to himself.

One of the fond recollections of my service in this distinguished legislative body will always be that I knew well and enjoyed the friendship and companionship of Judge BRAND.

I know the good people of Georgia, of whom he was always so fond, do miss him. To those who possessed his friendship I can truthfully say, " You never had a better friend."

What a loss to those of us here engaged in public service to have had a man of his type removed from among us. While we miss him in person, his counsel and judgment shall still be cherished, and our friendship and affection for him and the memory of his splendid service in behalf of the public shall remain undimmed.

My good friend, I shall not say farewell, for we shall meet again.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, Judge CHARLES H. BRAND, whose memory we honor today, was one of the ablest men of his generation in Georgia public service. His record of almost 40 years in public life was one of great brilliancy and was one of unbroken continuity, that fact indicating how strong was his grip upon the minds and hearts of his people, who never denied him any preferment that he asked and were always glad to utilize his capabilities in whatever capacities he was willing to serve them.

He began and ended his career in legislative service; first, for one term in the Georgia Senate, 1894–95, during which he was signally honored by selection as president pro tempore, and, last, by approximately 16 years' continuous service in Congress. Between these periods he served with distinction as solicitor general and as judge of the western judicial circuit of Georgia. The keenness of his mind, the broad scope of his legal knowledge, and his admirable judicial temperament, will be attested to not only by those who were associated with him in that service, but also by those who in later years saw these qualities secure for him in the Halls of our National Legislature the respect of all his fellows, and enable him to perform services for his people that a man of ordinary capabilities would have found impossible.

His successful career as business man in connection with his public and professional work also gave him an experience which added to his qualifications for congressional service and contributed largely toward securing for him the important place on the major Committee on Banking and Currency, which he held at his death.

His colleagues loved him, however, not so much for his attainments, for many men possess these without at the same time having qualities which draw their fellows close to them, but for his warm heart, sunny spirit, and unselfish willingness to help others, whether colleagues or his people at home, in every way that lay within his power. He was a prince of good fellows, a loyal friend, an able assistant of whosoever needed help that he could give; in short, he was entitled to high distinction on account of unusual qualities both of mind and heart, and his memory will live always with every man, woman, and child who came in contact with him in his long and useful life.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, the service that our late colleague, CHARLES HILLYER BRAND, rendered to the people whom he represented and to the country at large constitutes a memorial to his memory that cannot be matched by any humble words that I might utter in his praise.

For years his life had been devoted to the service of the people whom he loved, and their devotion to him is evidenced by their unfailing loyalty in returning him, time after time, to the seat in the House that he filled so well.

From 1917 until the spring of 1933 Judge BRAND was a Member of this body, but his public service cannot be measured by the noble work alone that he performed in Congress. For years prior to his entrance into Congress he was a devoted public servant, and he endeared himself to his people by serving them in many capacities.

Those of us who served with him here know full well of his tireless efforts in behalf of constructive legislation, and the number of you who served with him longer than I did are better acquainted with this phase of his public life than am I. For years before he entered this body, Judge BRAND, as he was known and loved in Georgia, served the people whom he loved with unflagging energy and zeal.

His career in public life began in 1894 when he served with distinction in the Georgia State Senate and was elected president pro tempore of that body during his first term.

This distinguished young statesman was soon promoted, and in 1897 he took office as solicitor general of the western judicial circuit of Georgia. For 8 years he served in this capacity, and so well did he perform his duties that he was elevated to the position of judge of the circuit.

For more than 10 years he graced the bench of this large circuit of north Georgia, and his marked ability soon placed him among the foremost members of the Georgia judiciary.

Promotion was again accorded Judge BRAND in 1917, when he entered the House of Representatives as the Member from the Eighth District of Georgia. In this body he served faithfully and ably for 16 years, and the work that he did here lies recorded in the deathless records of the Congress of the United States.

But, my colleagues, it was not in the realm of politics and law alone that our departed comrade distinguished himself. His industry and foresight early established him as a constructive business man, and until the time of his death he was active in promoting the development of the section that he loved so well.

Judge BRAND was president of the Brand Banking Co., of Lawrenceville, Ga., and his labors in the banking field aided greatly in the development of northeast Georgia. His wisdom, acumen, and integrity were recognized in his election to the board of directors of the Southern Mutual Life Insurance Co., of Athens, Ga.

Despite the demands of many official duties that were made upon him, Judge BRAND, with indefatigable energy, discharged the many pressing problems with which his business interests confronted him. He never neglected his constituency for his private business in any conceivable way, and yet his enormous capacity for work enabled him to carry on business enterprises that would occupy the full time of a man less able than he.

It is not always, however, the official records that portray a man's real worth. The image of a man that is held in the hearts of his friends signifies most clearly his real worth. How he is regarded by his friends and neighbors means more in determining his true value than all the printed references to which one might allude.

In this connection, permit me to dwell for a minute on one of the most touching scenes that I have ever witnessed—a scene, my colleagues, that demonstrated more emphatically than any words in man's command, the respect, reverence, and love with which CHARLES H. BRAND was held by his fellow men, the men and women who had been his companions, his neighbors, his friends, down the years. It is their testimony that speaks so clearly of his humanity, his friendship, and his devotion to the people whom he served.

I had the honor of attending his funeral as a representative of his colleagues in the House, and it was this occasion that brought home to me so forcefully the fact that he was not merely a representative of his people, but their counselor, their servant, their friend.

In the rolling red hills of north Georgia the mortal remains of CHARLES H. BRAND were laid to rest by the people whom he loved, and the sorrow of the hundreds who were in attendance testified more eloquently than words to the splendid qualities of our late comrade.

The brave women and strong men who knew him best gave vent to unashamed tears as CHARLES HILLYER BRAND'S body went to its last resting place. The people whom he loved and who loved him thronged the peaceful cemetery to pay their last respects to their departed friend.

Graphic realization that a friend of man was being laid to rest, as well as a patriot, was brought to me by the sight of this sorrowful multitude gathered in the quiet beauty of a peaceful cemetery set upon a wooded, red-clay hill that CHARLES HILLYER BRAND knew and loved so devotedly.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the State of Georgia and the entire Nation sustained a great loss in the death of Hon. CHARLES HILLYER BRAND.

Born in Loganville, Walton County, Ga., on April 20, 1861, the son of Egbert M. and Julia Ann Cooper Brand, he was reared to young manhood there. He attended the University of Georgia, and after his graduation in 1881 he located in Lawrenceville, Ga., where he began the practice of law and was admitted to the bar in September 1882. He possessed judicial temperament and was a lawyer of ability and integrity. He loved his profession, and it was ever his purpose to uphold the high ideals of this calling.

He was a member of the State senate for the 1894–95 term and was president pro tempore of that body. He served as solicitor general of the western judicial circuit from January 1, 1897, to 1905 and served as judge of said circuit from 1906 until his election to Congress in 1917.

From the time he was first elected to Congress on January 11, 1917, until the date of his death on May 17, 1933, he served his district, State, and country with honor and distinction. He was an able member of the Banking and Currency Committee for many years and was keenly interested in all legislation referred to this committee, being the president of one of the strongest banks in Georgia.

Judge BRAND was a man of keen intellect and sound judgment. He was innately fearless and courageous. He was firm in his conviction and always stood for what he thought to be right. He championed the cause of the masses and was ever ready and willing to assist those in need. He was a faithful public servant, a loyal friend, and a devoted and loving father.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. Speaker, in the death of Hon. CHARLES H. BRAND not only the State of Georgia but also the Nation sustained a great loss.

It was not my privilege to serve in Congress with Judge BRAND, but I knew him for a long number of years as a man and as a jurist. Before he came to Congress, he presided over several terms of court in the judicial circuit in which I was Solicitor General, and he impressed everyone with his eminent fairness, impartiality, and high legal attainments. He was indeed one of the greatest superior-court judges that the State of Georgia had. He possessed a judicial temperament and was devoted to his chosen profession of law.

He began his public career as a member of the State senate for the term of 1894–95 and was elected president pro tempore of that body. He was solicitor general of the western judicial circuit from 1897 to 1905, when he was elected judge of that circuit, serving until his election to Congress in 1917.

Throughout his entire public career, in the various responsible trusts that he held, he served with courage and ability. He was uncompromising in his devotion to what he believed to be right, yet fair and generous to any who might disagree with him. He possessed a keen intellect and sound judgment. He was a faithful public servant and a loyal friend.

Mr. CASTELLOW. Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that man receives his mental stimulus from numerous sources which, however, become selective in conformity with individual natures.

Intimate contact with cross-sections of life affords opportunities for knowledge otherwise inaccessible. Seeing the world and associating with its peoples store in the reservoirs of memory inspirations without which life to me would be infinitely poorer. An outstanding feature of the service here is the delightful fellowship with the Members of this splendid body. The rapidity, however, with which its personnel changes is most impressive.

At the time of my recent election to Congress, that distinguished gentleman, the Honorable CHARLES H. BRAND, was among our most prominent Members from Georgia. He ably filled an important post on the Banking and Currency Committee, in which his fearlessness and alert judicial mind rendered his services most valuable. Although I was not personally acquainted with Judge BRAND, our mutual friends were numerous, and I followed with interest his activities, anticipating with pleasure our prospective associations. However, his extended illness and subsequent death prevented the fruition of these hopes. I know him only by the record of his achievements and the kindly expressions of his associates. From these I have learned of his untiring devotion, not only to the service of his own district and State but also to every matter of national concern. Basing my judgment upon the opinion of those who knew him best, I feel that through the passing of Judge BRAND, our Nation, as well as the State of Georgia, has lost a notable Representative and most worthy citizen.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, we are here today to pay honor and respect to those of our colleagues who have passed on to the great beyond, "from whose bourne no traveler returns." We are somewhat consoled at our loss and at the Nation's loss when we recall to mind the noble records of service and achievement, such as those left behind by the late Congressman CHARLES HILLYER BRAND, who for many years represented the old Eighth, now Tenth, Congressional District of Georgia.

Judge BRAND, as he was universally known among his friends and constituents, was born in Loganville, Walton County, Ga., April 20, 1861, and educated in the public schools of his home town and the University of Georgia, graduating from this institution with an A.B. degree in 1881. The following year he began the practice of law in Lawrenceville, Ga., was elected to the State senate for the years 1894–95, serving as president pro tempore of that body. It was during this period of public service that his remarkable ability as legislator and as leader of men began to exhibit itself and won for him the esteem and respect of many men of prominence from over all the State, who remained his lifelong friends and supporters. Upon the expiration of his term of office as a State senator he was elected solicitor general of the western judicial circuit of Georgia by the general assembly. After serving in this capacity with energy and distinction for several years he was elevated to the judgeship through appointment by Governor Terrell. He remained in this position until he was elected to the Sixty-fifth Congress, January 11, 1917. From that time until his death on May 17, 1933, he served his country and district faithfully and well. Being a member of the important Committee on Banking and Currency, he took an active part in the drafting and enactment of much important legislation affecting the banking and currency systems of the Nation.

He charted his life's course with thought and wisdom and pressed forward to the goal with unswerving determination. His outstanding traits of character were loyalty, truthfulness, determination, and perseverance. He never deserted a friend nor harbored malice for an opponent. The welfare of his country and constituency was his personal concern. When in the last years of his life, after the ravages of time and disease had already taken a heavy toll, it became necessary for him to choose between the conservation of his fast-waning strength and the continued performance of his arduous official duties, he chose to pour forth his last remaining energy, as he had always done, in the interests of his friends and constituents, who had for so long a time honored him with their suffrage.

When on that beautiful spring day he answered the final roll call, he left behind a glorious record of public service and a host of sorrowing friends, who will always cherish in their hearts the memory of many kind deeds and valuable services, rendered by a noble and distinguished public servant.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, one of the sad things about life is that as we grow older we must suffer the passing of our friends, and they cannot be replaced.

In the death of the Honorable CHARLES H. BRAND the Congress was deprived of one of its most alert and able Members. Until his last sickness overtook him, he was active and aggressive in his attention to his duties. He served his district with zeal and discharged his obligations as a member of the important Banking and Currency Committee with fidelity.

He was a strong character, a man loyal to his friends and devoted to the people whom he served. His life was full of service in important positions of trust and responsibility, all of which he discharged with credit to himself and in a manner satisfactory to his people.

In his passing we have lost a tried and true public servant, a beloved friend, and a citizen in whom all Georgians felt a justifiable pride.

BOLIVAR EDWARDS KEMP

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, what greater tribute can we pay to our beloved dead than to impose upon our time and to devote these few moments in deep reverence, respect, and memory of our endeared colleagues, and to hope and pray for the repose of their souls, in the name of God?

My association with Hon. BOLIVAR EDWARDS KEMP was not in the least remote. The occasion of our first meeting was, indeed, one that I have always cherished—it was when I was elected to the Constitutional Convention of the State of Louisiana in 1921. Mr. KEMP was at that time a member of the board of supervisors of the Louisiana State University. It was his fine work in connection with educational matters that attracted my attention. We became close and stanch friends, and no occasion had intervened to mar our friendship; therefore our close alliance enduring until his death.

Mr. KEMP rendered a great public service. He was very active in promoting and developing agriculture and truck farming in Louisiana, and, indeed, was devoted ardently to that work and vital matters pertaining to his own congressional district.

Through his service on the board of the Louisiana State University, under Governor Hall in 1910, and through consecutive reappointments under succeeding Governors Pleasant, Parker, and Simpson, he fostered a love among his people that left in his wake a feeling of deep gratitude for the meritorious services he rendered.

Mr. KEMP'S first political office was his nomination for Congress to represent the Sixth Louisiana District; and as a result of his nomination, he was elected and thereby became a Member of the Sixty-ninth Congress. He was consecutively reelected to the Seventieth, Seventy-first, Seventy-second, and Seventy-third Congresses. It was during the summer of 1933, just after recess of the first session of the Seventy-third Congress, that my esteemed and distinguished colleague from Louisiana expired. He leaves behind in our endeared State of Louisiana a public service that will perpetuate his memory.

Mr. MONTET. Mr. Speaker, the death of our colleague, Hon. BOLIVAR E. KEMP, was not only a loss to his constituents but to the State of Louisiana and the Nation as well. He rendered many years of useful service to the country. His death was untimely. By reason of his intellectual attainments, his broad knowledge of law, and his many years of intelligent service in Congress, he had achieved in Congress the recognition to which his many outstanding qualifications entitled him when called to join the great multitude.

He was held in the highest esteem by those who many times honored him with election to this body. The honors that came to him were but incidents in his unselfish life, and, in themselves, were to him but as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals if he could not, as he did, make them instruments for good for his fellowmen. While he was respected as a lawmaker, people loved BOLIVAR KEMP, the man. And as the period which knew him in the flesh recedes into the past, he will be remembered for his deeds and words of love when his official acts shall have been forgotten. His patriotism was of the highest type. As a public servant, never a breath of scandal or suspicion attached itself to any of his public or private acts. Without parading it, he had a contempt for all shady or crooked transactions. His political life as well as private life was an open book. He was democratic in his mental methods, in his religion, and in his private life and habits; and while he loved peace, he never flinched in battle. If the people he represented could voice adequately the love their hearts feel for him, there would rise up paeans of praise that would echo through heaven's arches. He had the heart of a child, innocent, pure, trustful, hopeful, happy. Thrice blessed is he who is thus certified at the bar of heaven.

Nothing can now be done to bring him back to the useful life he lived, but the services rendered by him to his country as well as his fine character as a man will live on forever.

Mr. MALONEY of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, on this day, set aside by us as memorial day to give thought to and to pay respect to the memory of those of our colleagues who have departed, our thoughts become solemn as we reflect and realize how time moves on with its many, many changes; and as we look around and miss the faces of those who were with us—it seems only yesterday—but are not with us today, it causes us to reflect more seriously for a better understanding of the beginning and ending of our days on this earth. With these thoughts in our minds, we are reminded of a distinguished Representative from Louisiana who has responded to the call of our Creator; I refer to the Honorable BOLIVAR E. KEMP, who had the honor to serve his fellow citizens of his native State of Louisiana in this august branch of the Government for many years.

Mr. KEMP was one of our most beloved citizens. He comes from a family of Kemps that have been favorably and well known in Louisiana for many generations. In addition to professional duties as an attorney, he gave his time unstintingly for the betterment and welfare of his State. Many years ago citizens who knew him, and there were many, realizing his sterling qualities, insisted upon his representing them in this congressional body. They continuously honored him by reelection, thereby attesting their confidence and high regard for his capacity and reliability. He was not found wanting in his duties and served faithfully.

At the conclusion of the Seventy-second Congress, which was a most extraordinary session in many ways, Mr. KEMP discharged every public obligation and worked faithfully and diligently to assist in restoring this country to a normal condition. Shortly after Congress had adjourned, he was fatally stricken upon his arrival at his home in Louisiana, and that day, Mr. Speaker, was a day of great sorrow for the thousands of fellow citizens of his home State, as it was a distinct loss to his community.

BOLIVAR KEMP served his country patriotically and well. He has been missed in presence and service, as he was a man of fine personality and a ruling spirit. He carried on his work for the welfare of the Nation with much courage and ability. In his private life he was known as a dutiful son, a loving husband, an indulgent father, and a true friend.

I join with the Members of this House this day with bowed heads in paying reverence to his memory and extend my deepest sympathies to those endeared to him.

EDWARD BERTON ALMON

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, in the passing from this life of the Honorable EDWARD B. ALMON, Representative from the State of Alabama, one of the most trustworthy and faithful Representatives that has ever served in this House passed to his reward.

Those who served with him and lived close to him knew him well enough to properly evaluate his life and character, and they know as I know that in his death his congressional district, his State, and his country lost a valuable and loyal friend.

It was my good fortune to have lived near him for quite some time while here in Washington, and I never knew a time when he was not glad and willing to render a service whenever he could properly do so. He lived as truly by the golden rule, I believe, as anyone with whom I ever had the pleasure of being acquainted. He appreciated his friends deeply, but preferred to help them whenever he could rather than to call on them for assistance.

He served his State for some years in a judicial capacity—before coming to Congress—and I have not the least doubt he served his constituents in that capacity as he served them here in this legislative body.

There was no bluster, no false pretense, no sham, no self-glorification about EDWARD ALMON. His was a character rich in the finer impulses and fabric of life.

Many times he showed his kind heart and warm personal friendship.

He was a very hard-working Representative of the people, and in my judgment would be living today, except for the great strain he took upon himself in his continuous effort to serve his people in the very best way possible.

He was charitable to the extreme,
He was generous beyond measure;
He was held in greatest esteem,
He was in the highest sense a real treasure.

Those who served with him here, as well as his friends elsewhere, shall not soon forget him nor his splendid public service.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I find it impossible to adequately express my grief at the passing of my warm personal friend, Judge EDWARD B. ALMON, whose outstanding career came to an end on June 22, 1933. I shall never forget his many courtesies to me throughout our association here, and though my senior in years, there were strong ties of friendship and comradeship between us that I shall always treasure.

Few men in the history of Alabama were in the public service longer than Judge ALMON. Beginning as a judge of the eleventh judicial circuit of Alabama in 1898, he held public office for a period of 35 years, 20 years of which he was a Member of the Lower House of Congress. This long service attests not only the esteem and affection of his people but his outstanding ability. In his death Alabama and the Nation have lost a most valuable public servant. Gentle, kind, and generous, his heart overflowed with love for his fellow man. No man in the history of the Congress of the United States or in the public life of Alabama devoted himself more assiduously to his duties than did Judge ALMON. There can be no doubt that the intensity with which he applied himself to his duty in Washington shortened his useful life.

Coming to Congress on the eve of the World War, he became a prominent figure in the Wilson administration under which the governmental activities at Muscle Shoals were initiated in his district. From time to time, year after year, all the multiplied questions and problems involved at Muscle Shoals fell upon him more than on any other individual connected with the legislative branch of the Government. Regardless of the final status of that great enterprise and whatever valuable service it may render the people of the Nation, its development and its utilization must forever be linked with the name of EDWARD B. ALMON. During the last few years of his life I often regretted that Muscle Shoals was in his district, because I observed the telling effects upon his physical self resulting from his anxiety and his unfaltering efforts to settle that problem, which was frought with so many difficulties, and which was a national issue for so many years.

Judge ALMON served in both Houses of the Legislature of Alabama and was overwhelmingly elected as speaker of the house of representatives. In this position he presided with that sense of fairness which was so characteristic of him, and with his usual poise and dignity. In this position his outstanding service made him one of Alabama's most distinguished men. I doubt if there ever was a speaker of the Alabama Legislature more beloved by his colleagues, nor one whose labors were given more enthusiastically for the welfare of the people of his State. Both as a circuit judge and as a speaker, his sense of justice and his high ideals of citizenship endeared him to every man, woman, and child who knew him. The record of that service appealed to the intelligent people in the eighth district, who saw fit later to commission him as their Representative in Washington for so many years.

In the dark hour of sorrow and distress over his untimely death, it is consoling to his dear and devoted wife and family, as well as to those of us who served with him, to recall the affectionate esteem in which he was held on both sides of the aisle of the House. Judge ALMON'S death touched deeply the heart of everyone with whom he served in Congress. Without guile, without sham, with a genuineness and sincerity of purpose, with lofty ideals and purest patriotism, he walked his honor-strewn pathway of life, doing well his full duty at all times and under all circumstances as a citizen and as a prominent figure in the public affairs of his Nation. What more could be said of any man? While the human mind cannot invade the recesses of the great beyond, I thank God for that faith which gives me the unfaltering belief that the upright soul of EDWARD B. ALMON has found its resting place in that "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

As a citizen of Alabama, as one who held for him and holds for his family a genuine affection, I mourn the passing of my friend.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Mr. Speaker, EDWARD B. ALMON was born on a farm in Lawrence County, Ala. In the common schools and the university of his State he prepared himself for a long life of public service, and his name is written upon the judicial and political history of his State and the Nation.

He was a member of both houses of the Alabama Legislature and was chosen speaker of the lower house of that body. In 1898 he was elected circuit judge of the eleventh judicial circuit of Alabama and was reelected in 1904. Before his term as circuit judge expired, he was chosen to represent his district in the National House of Representatives and served continuously for 19 years and was a Member of Congress at the time of his death, June 22, 1933.

No Member stood higher in the estimation of his colleagues than EDWARD B. ALMON. He became Chairman of the great Committee on Roads and was a most efficient and industrious chairman and had the affection and respect of every member of the committee. I was assigned to that committee and had the pleasure of working with him throughout the special session of the Seventy-third Congress.

EDWARD B. ALMON was noted for his persistent industry, impeccable honesty, and uniform courtesy to his colleagues and toward all with whom he came in contact. But the outstanding trait or attribute of his character was his love for family and home, and this attribute was symbolic of his great love of country and his patriotic loyalty. EDWARD B. ALMON was in the true sense an American, and in all my life I have met no man of more sterling character and worth. It has been so often said that the death of a distinguished man was a great loss to the Republic. This can be truly said of EDWARD B. ALMON.

When I learned that he had lost the battle of life, and for this world was no more, there came across my mind, all uncalled, the lines of Whittier:

How strange it seems with so much gone
Of love and life, to still live on?

Mr. ALMON was stricken with his first serious illness near the beginning of the special session of the Seventy-third Congress and fought patiently and determinedly all through that session and never gave up hope of ultimate recovery but performed the duties that devolved upon him as chairman of his great committee and all his congressional duties despite pain and his enervated physical condition.

He discharged many of his official duties from a bed of pain, and by his bedside was ever found his faithful wife, anxious, watchful, and alert to minister in every emergency and to comfort him all the way. His devotion to his family was beautiful.

I deeply sympathize with his family and all who mourn his loss, and I account the memory of EDWARD B. ALMON a treasure of real value.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, it is with a sense of very deep and genuine personal sorrow that I undertake to pay a brief tribute to the private character and public services of my late friend, Judge EDWARD B. ALMON, for whom I have held not only a very great admiration for his public services over a long period of years but especially because of my warm personal attachments and affection for him. When I received the distressing intelligence of his departure from the scenes of his earthly labors, it was to me a genuine personal grief and sorrow. Almost from the days of my boyhood I had been associated with him in many activities, and his genial nature, his fine personal character, and his admirable qualities of heart and head had drawn me to him with a very warm tie of esteem and admiration.

Judge ALMON was entirely a self-made man. I mean by that that he did not have the early advantages of wealthy environments, or of influential and powerful friends to advance his interests. He was born and reared on a farm in north Alabama and knew the fatigue of plowing the fields and of performing the usual tasks of a country-reared boy. However, there developed early in his life grim determination not only to secure an adequate education but also to make for himself a worthy career, and before the conclusion of his life he had accomplished, in a very large degree, his youthful ambitions. Early in life he developed a great aptitude in the field of politics and during his life held many positions of great trust and responsibility. He not only served in both branches of the State legislature but was elected speaker of the house of representatives in 1911, a position which he held with credit to himself and profit to the State of Alabama. His legal attainments were of such high quality that he was elected for a period of 12 years to adorn the bench as a circuit judge in Alabama, and in the performance of his official duties left a very enviable record for judicial achievements.

Judge ALMON was elected to the Sixty-fourth Congress, and was continually elected from term to term thereafter up until the time of his death. In the House he served on many important committees, and at the time of his death was Chairman of the Committee on Roads, which gave him an opportunity to be of very great service not only to his State but to the entire country in securing very generous appropriations for the maintenance and improvement of our highway system. Every public highway under Federal jurisdiction constructed within the last few years is an everlasting monument to the foresight and wisdom of this great Alabama advocate of good roads.

After the first development of the great Muscle Shoals project in Alabama Judge ALMON was recognized as the leader in Congress of every movement looking toward the further improvement and utilization of that great national project, and to his untiring energies was very largely due the credit of the present magnificent prospect for the further utilization of Muscle Shoals and its Federal activities for the building of a great empire in the Tennessee Valley.

In addition to Judge ALMON'S splendid public services, I also desire to pay brief tribute to his fine personal qualities. I have never known any man who was more warmly attached to his real friends or who would make greater efforts to serve their interests. He was never a man to forsake an old and tried friend in order to try to make a new one. He was a man of very fine spiritual vision and of deep religious convictions. He was devoted to his church and to every social movement which had for its purpose the elevation of mankind. I had frequent opportunities to observe the very tender and everlasting devotion which he exhibited for his beloved life companion and also for his children and the other members of his family. I think that no higher tribute can be paid to a man than to say of him that he was a good husband and a good father. I had the distressing privilege of attending the last obsequies of my beloved friend, and the great multitude of people from his home city and his congressional district and all parts of Alabama testified to the great veneration and affection in which he was held by the people whom he had so long served and who knew of his many estimable qualities. I shall always esteem it a high privilege to cherish an affectionate memory of the admirable qualities of this great and good son of Alabama.

Mr. CARMICHAEL. Mr. Speaker, my friend, Judge E. B. ALMON, was my immediate predecessor as a Member of the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

I am living in and enjoying the "aftershine" of his long and useful service. He was elected a Member of the Sixty-fourth and of each subsequent Congress, and those of you who knew him will bear testimony that he was a buoyant public servant. Probably no Congressman ever appraised more highly than did Judge ALMON the distinguished honor of being a Member of the greatest legislative body on earth. He was happy in the many races that he made for public office and in the faithful all-time discharge of his duties. Fully conscious of his obligations and eager to discharge them, he carried victory with modesty; he was not puffed up; did not behave himself unseemly even in the glow of success. Judge ALMON was really very happy to know people. He loved them without simulation, and they loved him. He was interested in the state of the Union and in all its people in a big way, but in a very definite and active way he served each one of his constituents as legislator, patriot, and friend. The name and face of each of his constituents were hidden in his heart.

Judge ALMON was born and reared in Lawrence County, Ala. His family was solid and substantial and well established in Alabama. He attended the common schools and afterward took his degree in law at the University of Alabama. For many years he was a busy, successful lawyer. He served as circuit judge for 12 years in succession. He was a member of the Legislature of Alabama, during which time he was the able speaker of the house of representatives. He was a Democrat and was frequently called on to do party services, which he did with zeal and ability.

During his professional career I knew him best. He and I went to Tuscumbia, Ala., in the Muscle Shoals district, about the same time. We practiced law at all the courthouses in the circuit after the old style. We attended the same church and the same Masonic lodge. In those days fraternal and church life had not been crashed by modern thought. The Constitution was considered a sound foundation and the Bible the Rock of Ages. Judge ALMON was true and safe in all the relations of life.

Let me, in truth and sincerity, give him the highest attribute a man can receive—"He loved his fellow man."

These remarks would not be complete without allusion to Luie Clopper Almon. In early manhood my friend married Miss Luie Clopper, a young woman of remarkable mentality. They went along hand in hand, and both acquired culture and political acumen. It is sure no man ever had stronger support as he advanced to the heights.

The capstone of Judge ALMON'S career was the passage by the Congress of the act which provides for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals, in the State of Alabama, by the Tennessee Valley Authority. By Judge ALMON'S long-time, able, and heroic effort in cooperation with other Members of Congress, the Tennessee Valley Authority will give opportunity to all people within its domain to live and to enjoy a fuller life. Maybe the Golden Rule, "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even to them", will be enacted into inexorable law.

In the leafy month of June 1933, my good friend and your fellow worker was called from labor to refreshment, was summoned to service in a country where there are no experiments or adventures, in a land—

> Where there is no night, where there are no tears, * * * and the gates thereof shall not be shut by day, for there shall be no night there.

He answered the summons cheerfully. Today he enjoys the full compensation of duty well done, a faithful son in the presence of his Father. We shall miss him.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by

W. C. Markham, executive secretary, American Association of State Highway Officials, on EDWARD B. ALMON:

Almost within the sound of the rushing waters of the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals, Ala., a boy was born April 18, 1860, who for many years has been a constructive leader in both State and national life.

EDWARD B. ALMON has been a member of the House Committee on Roads of the National Congress ever since 1915, and therefore was there to help report out of committee the first Federal-aid appropriation for roads.

But his interest in highways did not begin then. Raised on a farm on which, as early as 8 years of age, he was compelled to plow the fields and help gather and market the grain, he early learned that the highway was the commercial artery for the farmer. Persistently determined to have an education, he attended a normal school in his own county, and this was followed by a law course at the State university. After several years in the practice of his chosen profession, his legal education and experience led his neighbors to elect him judge of the circuit court.

Then followed service in both branches of the State legislature; and here, while speaker of the house, he was author of the bill, passed in 1911, providing for the State to take upon itself authority to improve the highways. It was at his suggestion and through his influence that the late lamented W. S. Keller, whom he had known from boyhood, was appointed the first State highway engineer of Alabama. Mr. Keller will be remembered as one of the founders of this organization, a former president and a potent influence for many years in its constructive operations.

Judge ALMON, as we all loved to call him, took an active and guiding part in Federal legislation for highways from the beginning of congressional interest in these matters. His manner of approach was quiet and modest in the extreme; but his persistence and thoroughness made him an authority on the subject. For the past 2 years he was the chairman of this important committee and worked assiduously for needed Federal legislation.

In the shifting of political fortunes, Judge ALMON insisted that need for improved highways should have no sectional or party considerations. When the last Congress faltered in its allegiance to regular Federal policies for roads and members of his committee wavered, he quietly informed them that the House Committee on Roads in the 18 years of its deliberations had always voted to report a bill by unanimous accord, and his quiet persuasion won the day.

Burdened with years and a failing heart throb, he carried on during the strenuous days of the extra session last spring. Rising from his bed and leaning on my arm, he appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means in behalf of the unemployed who might get some means of support through building roads.

On May 26th last, he appeared in the well of the House to add his spoken influence in behalf of this legislation. Congress had hardly adjourned when, the immediate task being finished, he passed on to the Beyond, at early dawn of a brilliant day.

A public official in whom there was no guile, a citizen of the entire Republic, a heart mellowed with human kindness, and a soul stirred with the highest type of service—we pause today in sincere gratitude for the effective accomplishments of his undertakings, remembering with deep appreciation his personal interest in this work in which we are now engaged.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, EDWARD B. ALMON was first elected a Member of the Sixty-fourth Congress and to each succeeding Congress until his death in June 1933. In his passing Alabama lost an illustrious son, the country a sincere patriot, the Congress a tireless worker, and the wide circle of his colleagues a loyal friend.

I will leave to others the office of speaking of the particulars of his birth, education, and life. From a long association with him in Congress and from contacts with his home constituents, there was thrown on my mind and heart a composite picture of him, which I shall never forget, and which I will always cherish as one of the most pleasant memories of my life. That picture represents, I feel, the views of his colleagues who were associated with him in the House. With all individual views merged, interwoven, and overshadowed into one, the picture of the true man stands forth in my mind clean-cut, complete in outline, and beautiful, and my only regret is that feeble words cannot reproduce the view of a perfect picture of this friend.

The men are few in active political life, who have the intelligence, tolerance, and moral strength to withstand the searchlight of daily familiarity with a large local constituency and rise above local jealousies and criticisms. Few there are who can stand forth unsullied, transparent, and flawless under the X-ray of public opinion, but Judge ALMON came as near meeting such a test as anyone I ever knew.

He never grew away from his friends, the common people, as he climbed the ladder of political preferment, but he seemed to cling closely to the plain people—friends and fellow citizens of his early life—and as years and honors were added to his useful life, he continued to command and enjoy their respect and confidence, which is the one goal that every true public servant cherishes above all else.

Into his work as a Member of this body he threw all of his splendid energies; and his refusal, when stricken with a serious physical disability, to follow the advice of physicians and friends, to devote more time to quiet and rest, unquestionably hastened his untimely death; his strongest desire was to continue to the end as an active, vigorous worker.

Mr. Speaker, to my mind the life of Judge ALMON, as he was familiarly known to all his colleagues, teaches a fruitful lesson and shines forth as a beacon of hope for this Republic. Simplicity, sincerity, and honesty were the forceful characteristics of his long public service, and just so long as men of pure lives, unselfish motives, and untiring devotion to the interest and welfare of the masses, from whom they spring, continue in control of our public affairs—and I believe they will—this Government is amply safeguarded and will survive.

There are innumerable features of our governmental system of which we are justly proud, and with ample reason; but to my mind all others are of little moment compared with the fact that the plain men of simple tastes and inexpensive habits, pure and unselfish motives, are the rulers of this land.

Where 1 man attains high station through great riches, 10 men of the stamp and mold of my lamented friend, Judge ALMON, reach equal station and wield, man for man, much greater influence in the affairs that shape our destiny, and never was this truer than at present.

Simple in his tastes, frank in all his dealings, trusting and forgiving in his nature, conspicuous in his devotion to his family, with an ability which enabled him to cope well with the questions of the time, he commanded the respect of all.

I was in his home city the day of his burial, and you could read his death in the face of everyone. I never saw a more marked manifestation of grief and sorrow by an entire community than I witnessed on that day. The zenith of any man's glory is reached when at the end of his public career he can lie down, as Judge ALMON did, to his eternal sleep, truly loved, respected, honored, and mourned by all his neighbors—those of high estate and low. History will preserve his name, but his home community, his fellow townsmen, will never cease to consider it as their special possession and will transfer it with grateful pride to posterity.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following tribute to the late EDWARD B. ALMON by Senator JOHN H. BANKHEAD, of Alabama:

EDWARD B. ALMON was born in Lawrence County, Ala., on April 18, 1860. He lived nearly three quarters of a century and died at Washington on June 22, 1933. Judge ALMON's parents were worthy pioneers in a new country. He was born about 41 years after Alabama was admitted to the Union, and at the time of his death, in June 1933, his life had spanned nearly two thirds of the life of his State.

As a boy EDWARD never saw a surfaced road. The cumbersome stagecoach and the slow freight wagon, moving over almost impassable roads, furnished the chief means of transportation. Towns were small and far apart. Life in North Alabama in those days was entirely rural and agricultural. Thirty miles meant a day's journey when the roads were dry, and all communication was practically stopped when the roads were soaked with rain. Whole families and communities were frequently marooned during the long parts of the winter as completely as if they had been on an island in the sea.

Such are the possibilities of American life, that the boy, reared among those surroundings, became in later life a member, and afterwards the Chairman of the Committee on Roads of the National House of Representatives, and played a large part in bringing into being a mighty system of national highways stretching from ocean to ocean, and linking together the 48 States of the Union in new indissoluble bonds of commerce and social interchange.

Judge ALMON received a common-school education in the rural schools of Lawrence County, completed his academic education at the Normal College at Florence, Ala., and afterward was graduated from the law department of the University of Alabama. He was admitted to the bar in 1885 and began the practice of law at Tuscumbia, where he maintained his home for nearly 50 years. He became an aggressive, forceful, and successful lawyer. In his office he was a sound, able, and prudent adviser. He took a deep and abiding personal interest in his clients, and in advising them looked solely to their well-being. As he grew in prestige, he was always a fine influence in the life of his community. In his office, he not only gave sound legal advice, but radiated good will, kindliness, and good fellowship. He was a tireless worker and a careful and painstaking student.

Judge ALMON was at his best as an advocate. He loved the court room. He knew men and their motives and understood juries and their mental processes. He prepared his cases thoroughly and brought to their trial accurate legal knowledge, fine common sense, an acute knowledge of human nature, and a genial, kindly humor. Judge ALMON was a successful trial lawyer and was for many years a conspicuous figure in the courts of his and surrounding counties.

In length and variety of public service, as well as in the distinguished character of that service, Judge ALMON's life was a very full and useful one. He served in the Alabama State Senate during the session beginning in 1892 and ending in 1894. He became judge of the Circuit Court of the Eleventh Judicial Circuit of Alabama in 1898 and served as judge of that circuit until 1906. He was elected to the Alabama House of Representatives in 1910 and served for a term of 4 years, becoming speaker of the house in 1911. He was elected as a Democrat to the Sixty-fourth Congress and to every succeeding Congress until the time of his death on June 22, 1933.

Judge ALMON came to Washington at the mature age of 55 years. He brought with him to the Nation's Capitol the dignity, poise, and sense of fairness of a judge, the knowledge of parliamentary procedure and of legislative methods which he had gained as a State senator and as a member and speaker of the Alabama House of Representatives, and the powers as a debater gained through many years of trial work in the various courts of north Alabama.

EDWARD B. ALMON was not only a successful lawyer and an able and trusted public servant but his life radiated the fine social graces so necessary to a well-rounded manhood. For almost two generations the Almon home at Tuscumbia was a center of domestic happiness and of a most charming and informal hospitality. In early life he married Lulie Clopper, a charming daughter of his adopted town. They had a lovely household. Mrs. Almon, a gracious, kindly, and brilliant hostess, contributed much to the delightful atmosphere of pleasant cordiality which pervaded this fine old southern home, where relatives, friends, and the stranger within the gates enjoyed the welcoming smile, the warm handclasp, the pleasant humor, and the fine conversation which give essence and character to the best American home life.

The thing which impresses us most as we reflect on the life and character of Judge ALMON is the completeness of his life and the well-roundedness of his character. He was a successful lawyer, a communicant of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, quietly but deeply religious, a loving husband, a wise and kind father, an unselfish friend, a public-spirited citizen, a just and capable judge, and an able legislator.

The keynote of Judge ALMON's life was service. To his family, his friends, his church, his community, his clients, his country, he gave his best for half a century.

Few congressional districts in the United States have received the same character of service which Judge ALMON gave to the Eighth District of Alabama. In volume, his personal correspondence with his constituents was colossal. Almost every man and woman in the seven counties of his district regarded him as a friend, and he encouraged them all to call on him for any service he could render them. It has often been said that he had more calls on his time from individual constituents than any other Member of the House, and every call, however humble the applicant, received his earnest personal attention.

Judge ALMON always had time for what we call the little things, but in giving them the most minute attention, he did not let the multitude of these interfere with the big things which his duties as a Congressman imposed upon him. He was elected to 10 successive Congresses and played a large part in shaping the enactment of much useful legislation. He was an ardent party man; but when the policies and purposes of partisonship ran contrary to the national interest, he always submerged them to what he conceived to be the good of his country. His untiring work in helping to promote a great system of State and national highways, financed jointly by the States and the Federal Government, have resulted in untold benefits to the people of the United States. He served for many years with great distinction as a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. His ceaseless efforts, during almost 10 terms of Congress, for the development of water power and the promotion of navigation on the Tennessee River, culminating in the building of the Wilson Dam and in the creation and organization of the Tennesee Valley Authority, constitute the crowning achievement of his congressional career.

National policies change to meet altering conditions and changes of public opinion and of administrations; hence it is that much of our most important national legislation is but temporary. The two great objects to which Judge ALMON dedicated his activities as a Member of Congress are permanent. The good roads of the United States will be rendering their contribution to easy and pleasant transportation, to the fostering of commerce and interchange of goods among our people, to the bringing of far places close together, and carrying the life of the country to town and city people and the pleasures of city life to our farms, as long as this Government exists.

The Wilson Dam is as permanent as the National Capitol. Already two other great dams are in course of construction on the Tennessee River and its tributaries, and three others are under consideration. The day will come when navigation on the Tennessee River will move for almost its entire length along a mighty chain of lakes and will lock through a series of great dams, and these lakes and dams will form a system of correlated transportation and power distribution unsurpassed in the world.

The practical mind of our friend and colleague saw this vision 20 years ago. He devoted much of his congressional life mainly to its accomplishment. Many others saw the same vision and have helped to make of it a reality. While to other Members in Congress it was a matter for serious but occasional attention, to him it was the one imperative task—a life work, an obsession which filled his mind and heart for almost a generation. Who can say that this great work would ever have been accomplished without him?

We but perform a simple duty when we render this and other tributes to the life and character of our departed friend. While they add little to his stature, the study of a life like his, actuated by the motives that impelled him and made sacred by the devotion and consecration which he carried to his tasks, help the student to a finer manhood and a nobler character.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, as we contemplate the life and death of Judge EDWARD B. ALMON, we are reminded of the story of the life and death of the great Jewish Lawgiver. For 40 years Moses had borne the burdens of state, shaped the Jews into a nation, determined their civil and religious polity, administered their laws, directed their steps, or dwelt with them in all their wanderings in the wilderness. He had suffered in their punishment and led them in wars until the end of their labors drew nigh. Only Jordan lay between them and the Promised Land. Then came to Moses the word of the Lord: Thou mayest not go over; get thee up into the mountain, look upon it, and die.

With eager longing, with breaking heart, the great leader looked upon the Promised Land and then lay down and died. For more than a quarter of a century, Judge ALMON worked and wrought and toiled for the development of the Valley of the Tennessee with its conjunctions of coal, iron, water-power, and other resources more fateful than the conjunctions of the stars. This marvelous development with its untold possibilities for the welfare and the happiness of the people was to him the promised land. Day after day and year after year the manifold difficulties and problems of the long struggle with all its temporary defeats and disappointments fell upon Judge ALMON. He carried them upon his heart. He labored all the more assiduously to overcome them. In the end he triumphed but did not live—to see his own work out and watch the sandy footprints harden into stone.

Within a few brief weeks after the enactment of the legislation making possible and insuring the wonderful development Judge ALMON paid the toll for his long and laborious efforts and lay down forever. But the great project with its benefits and its blessings to all the people must forever be linked with the name of EDWARD B. ALMON. And as the waters of the Tennessee roll on to the sea through the ages, they will sing his praises and chant his requiem.

Judge ALMON loved people. He possessed the smile and grasp of friendship. He was never so happy as when he was home mixing and mingling with his constituents, giving an account of his stewardship to them at their barbecues or breaking bread with them at their picnics. He had that human, intimate touch that caused little children to love him, that bound men to him with hoops of steel, that led the people to know the warmth and the grace of his soul and that won for him the affectionate esteem in which he was held by all with whom he served in this House. He delighted in serving his constituents. No man was ever more indefatigable or more painstaking or more resourceful in meeting the many calls that come to a Member of this body. It might be a request of petty significance from the humblest of persons, but it always received the very best and most expeditious attention possible at Judge ALMON'S hands.

Judge ALMON had the genius of common sense. He never tried to fit square pegs in round holes. He knew and understood human nature and saw deep into the motives of men. He had faith in the people. He believed in their final judgment and in the moral standards that moved and at last controlled them. He was chief among them because he was the servant of all of them.

Usually it is through physical and mental stress and strain that one battles his way through the years to a place in the Congress. Judge ALMON had step by step mounted the ladder to this eminence. He served in both houses of the Legislature of Alabama. He was overwhelmingly elected speaker of the house of representatives; and history records that he was one of the fairest, ablest, and most popular speakers that ever won distinction in that position. By his work, by the causes he advocated, by the high order of his leadership, he wove his name into the warp and woof of the life of the State. For 12 years Judge ALMON set an example as a just and upright judge, holding evenly the scales of justice as he sat upon the bench of his circuit. For 35 years he held public office. Twenty of these years he spent in this House. Such a long and varied service attests the ability, the character, and the genius of the man more enduringly and more significantly than words can express. No appreciation of Judge ALMON and his services could be complete without a word of tribute to her who for nearly half a century was the companion of his love, the helpmate of his career, his kindest critic, his best friend, his brave and devoted wife.

Judge ALMON was my friend from the days of my beginning in this House. My senior by many years, he seemed ever eager to help me along the way and to direct me to the right road. He was kind, generous, and good to me. I am among the hundreds who loved him and who mourn his passing. I salute his memory and shall ever cherish the rich treasure of his friendship.

> His gentleness, his tenderness, his fair courtesy,
> Were like a ring of virtues 'bout him set,
> And Godlike charity, the center where all met.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, the death of Judge EDWARD B. ALMON brought to an end the career of one of Alabama's most beloved sons. His record is a source of pride to the people of his State and typical of the possibilities awaiting the youth of the Nation. He was born on a farm, and his early years were marked by heroic struggles against adversity and in an environment of limited opportunities. During these early years he learned of the hardships experienced by the great body of our citizenship attached to the soil. It was in these experiences that he developed those rugged qualities that endeared him to those about him and armed him with an understanding of his people and of the problems that were to confront him in public life.

His rise was by gradual processes. He improved every opportunity to gain an education. He attended the common schools, the State Normal College at Florence, from which he was graduated, and he became a graduate of the University of Alabama. He was admitted to the bar and attained high rank as a lawyer. The people soon discovered in him the rare qualities that fitted him for service on the bench. He was elected circuit judge, in which office he served with a distinction that won for him reelection without opposition.

He served as elector for the State, as representative in the legislature, as senator, and again as a representative in the legislature and speaker of the house of representatives. In the legislature he was a leader and won an admirable place in the esteem of the people of the State.

He was a leader in the good-roads movement in Alabama and author of the law establishing a highway commission for the State.

He was elected to Congress from the Eighth District in 1914 and served continuously to the time of his death, June 22, 1933. His hold upon the confidence and affections of his people was such that he had come to be invincible in his district. As a Member of Congress he made a contribution to the development of good roads throughout the Nation that gives him a place among those who rank first in the promotion of that national movement.

The son of a farmer, of the soil, and loving it, he could not escape the sincere conviction that the ills of the farmer were at the bottom of all the economic adversities afflicting the Nation. The conviction furthered a determination to dedicate his talents and services to the task of winning for agriculture an equitable place in our economic structure.

The paramount endeavor of his public career was in connection with the development of Muscle Shoals. To this he devoted the best years and labors of his life. That contest presented especial need for the marvelous energy, the dogged persistence, the splendid legal training, the high order of diplomacy, and the superb political acumen which he displayed to a degree seldom surpassed. He supplied the leadership around which were rallied the forces that fought and won the struggle for the development of Muscle Shoals and its dedication to the cause of agriculture and the general welfare.

His was the labor of a great man devoted to a great task. Forgetful of himself, heedless of opposition and temporary disappointment, his eyes were fixed always on a star whose brilliance no passing cloud could dim.

So devoted was he to the purpose of public service that all warnings of his physician and of loved ones were disregarded. Happy coincidence that he should have lived to witness the fruition of his labors.

He met every test as citizen, as father, as husband, as public servant. He was true to his family, true to his church, true to his State, true to the best traditions of the Republic.

It has been my privilege to form many dear and lasting friendships since I became a Member of Congress. This is especially true as to those who were contemporary with my entrance. Among all those whose friendship I hold dear, none has held higher place in my heart than Judge ALMON. I gained much of inspiration from him, and his wise counsel often guided me in matters of momentous importance. I loved him, and I shall never cease to miss him.

I made the journey with friends and loved ones who accompanied his body to his home in the city of Tuscumbia. I watched the throng of loyal friends from all walks of life who gathered to pay their tributes of admiration and devotion. They came from far and near—many with flowers and all in tears—to pay honor to their friend and beloved public servant. Such honors were worthy of the noble life and character. His body was laid to rest in the soil of his native State, on the banks of his beloved Tennessee. Its waters will sing a ceaseless requiem to his memory. The record of his public service is the proud heritage of an unforgetful people. Alabama will honor and cherish his name through future years as a loyal son and faithful public servant.

HENRY WINFIELD WATSON

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, our colleague, Hon. HENRY W. WATSON, dean of the Pennsylvania delegation, has gone to his reward. He rendered faithful service to this country, to the State of Pennsylvania, and to the Republican Party—service that was outstanding and meritorious.

HENRY W. WATSON was a man in the true sense of the word. He was sensible, reasonable, dependable, and was honored by all his colleagues in the House of Representatives. He was a member of the Ways and Means Committee, one of the most important committee assignments one can have as a Representative; and he filled the post with credit and honor to himself and to his country. He never aspired to prominence in the ordinary business of the House. With abundant capacity for the most important public service, his modesty constrained him to allow to others all that conspicuous display which attracts the admiration of the world outside. He was dean of the Pennsylvania delegation and respected most highly by all its members.

I counted him whom we mourn as my friend. He was a man among men, a venerable scholar in politics. No one could help but be impressed with his placid dignity, his serenity, his patience, and his quiet courage.

HENRY WATSON performed most patriotic services. In Congress he expressed the will of the people, and he interpreted it for their best interest.

But all earthly work must end; life is a continuous procession of events. Our words of farewell to a fellow worker should not be alone those of grief that man's common lot has come to him, but of pride and joy for all the good he has accomplished. "One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: but the earth abideth forever."

The progress of the world goes on, and we realize in every step more and more its upward purpose. If we and all things are not working together for good, if our life is but a breath exhaled and then forever lost, our work means little. Our duty is not only to pay tribute to the dead but to cheer the living. May we say to those left behind:

Early parting is the bitterest experience of human life.
Death is the dawn of morning.
The dawn will be eternal life.
Eternity will see the glad reunion.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, my heart was filled with grief and deep sorrow when, on that beautiful Sunday, August 27, 1933, I learned of the death of my close personal friend and colleague, Hon. HENRY W. WATSON.

HENRY WATSON and I formed an intimate friendship from the day both of us entered our official duties in the Sixty-fourth Congress, and this devotion continued to the end. Our congressional districts were adjoining, and most of their interests were common to each other.

Mr. WATSON's work here was characterized by a quiet reticence, although his influence was extensive, and his accomplishments for his district were recorded indelibly in the hearts of his constituents. Recognition and appreciation of the high type of public service he rendered and the degree of confidence and esteem in which he was held by his constituency were evidenced by his continued reelection to Congress with increased majorities.

Always a stanch Republican, Mr. WATSON believed in and fought for the adoption of his party's principles. He performed his duties as he believed to be right. He was a hard-working, painstaking legislator, with a mind that was keen and alert. He rendered valuable service to his district, State, and country, and has left affectionate recollections in our hearts.

May he rest with his fathers in the peace he has earned.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the memory of the late Honorable HENRY W. WATSON, my colleague from the great Keystone State.

HENRY WATSON was a distinguished Member of this House, having served his people faithfully for 18 years, and his sudden death is mourned by every Member who knew him.

It was not my privilege to be associated with him in this House for more than one session, but during that short time I learned to respect and love him.

He was intensely interested in the people he represented, always anxious to serve them, deeply mindful of what he believed to be their best interests. No greater tribute can be paid to any man than to say that he was faithful to the trust imposed upon him by the people.

I join with his host of friends who mourn his loss, knowing that the country has lost a useful and devoted servant and this legislative body a great legislator.

Mr. KINZER. Mr. Speaker, in the death on August 27, 1933, of our colleague, Hon. HENRY W. WATSON, the Nation, as well as the State of Pennsylvania, lost the services of one of its most able and faithful public servants. Born in Bucks County, Pa., on June 24, 1856, he pursued his education in private schools, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1881 and became an honored member of the Philadelphia bar.

Early in his life he took interest in public affairs and was ever engaged in the people's fight. His friends and the citizens of the Ninth Congressional District of Pennsylvania, appreciating his worth and ability, sent him to the Sixty-fourth Congress; and to their credit and in recognition of Mr. WATSON's faithful, honest, and effective services, his constituency returned him to each succeeding Congress until death removed him from the scene of his earthly activities.

As a Member of the Sixty-fourth and each succeeding Congress, his influence grew and his grasp of public affairs increased, and he brought to the powerful Ways and Means Committee that ability, devotion, and effective service which he so ably and willingly contributed.

As dean and chairman of the Pennsylvania Republican delegation, we all enjoyed his kindly spirit, helpful advice, and sincere friendship. We, his colleagues, have each and all suffered a distinct loss in his death.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Speaker, we gather today to pay our respects to our colleagues who have departed this life in the past year. Among them we mourn the loss of HENRY WINFIELD WATSON, of the State of Pennsylvania, a gentleman of the "old school", and my personal friend. We were both elected to the Sixty-fourth Congress, and for a number of years we were associated very closely as members of the Committee on Ways and Means. A stanch Republican and a firm believer in the principles of a protective tariff, we were usually found voting together on all legislative matters relating to the tariff.

Quiet and unassuming in his manner, he possessed a keen mind and intellect, and his judgment was unfailingly sound. He was ever zealous for the welfare of the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and his work on the Ways and Means Committee in behalf of that great industrial State is written in bold relief upon the records of Congress. In his death not alone the Ninth District of Pennsylvania suffers the loss of a devoted Representative in the Congress of the Nation but the State of Pennsylvania and industrial America as well.

My association with HENRY WINFIELD WATSON in Congress and the friendship that existed between us will always remain a happy memory. He has gone to reap that final reward which he so justly deserved, but we shall ever keep in our hearts cherished recollections of the courtly and distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, HENRY WINFIELD WATSON passed away peacefully and without suffering, succumbing to a heart attack, at his home in Langhorne, Bucks County, Pa., on August 27, 1933, at the ripe age of 77 years.

At the time of his death he was serving his ninth consecutive term as Congressman from the Ninth District of Pennsylvania. He was the oldest Member of the House in point of years and one of the oldest in length of service.

He was first elected in 1914 to the Sixty-fourth Congress; and throughout the ensuing 19 years, to the time of his passing on August 27, 1933, he continued to serve in this body with credit and distinction and with the esteem of his fellow Members.

Although a Republican of the stanchest type, his judgment and tact and personal charm were such that he enjoyed the respect and confidence of every President under whom he served, Democrat and Republican alike.

Neither in his political philosophy nor in the other characteristics of his life was Congressman WATSON of the roving kind. Born in Buckingham, Bucks County, June 24, 1856, the son of Mitchell and Anna Bacon Watson, our honored colleague lived his 77 years in that county, which was one of the two constituting the congressional district he represented.

And likewise in his political creed. To his lasting credit and esteemed memory let it be said that there was never any doubt as to where Congressman WATSON stood on any public question. He led no political double life. He was anchored to those fundamentals which characterize what is termed the "conservative." He was a stanch and able defender of constitutional government, and he was a vigorous, uncompromising advocate of that Republican doctrine of protection which Henry Clay so aptly described as constituting the American system.

Educated in private schools, Congressman WATSON studied law under that noted Philadelphia lawyer, F. Carroll Brewster, Esq., and was admitted to the bar in 1881. Prior to entering Congress he was connected with a financial institution, and for many years he was friend, patron, and adviser to innumerable activities in which his own constituents were directly and indirectly concerned.

He was a member of the important Committee on Ways and Means.

His last campaign was one of the hardest in his life, and he was delighted to be reelected in November 1932 by a margin of a few thousand votes, having lost Lehigh County but fortunately winning Bucks County by a sufficient margin to secure his victory.

When the Saturday before the election came, he thought he might rest from his strenuous efforts but received a late telephone message to come to Allentown that evening. Tired as he was, he started off and arrived there at 9 o'clock. He was a tireless fighter and an interesting and forceful speaker.

One evening he called me on the telephone to ask me to join him at the Press Club supper in celebration of the legalization of beer. I gladly accepted, and we drank some beer which had been sent from his district. Going home I urged him to let me take him in a taxi, remembering he was not a young man; but he said he preferred walking, and he strode along the half hour's walk as rapidly as a man 20 years younger.

He resided at 1765 Massachusetts Avenue, in a handsome house he had formerly purchased from the estate of Henry Cabot Lodge. Many times I dined there and enjoyed the pleasure of his and Mrs. Watson's cheery company. They were exceedingly pleasant, hospitable, and kindly.

Very often I called upon him for advice and found his judgment unusually sound.

He was looking forward, he told me, to one of the greatest eras of prosperity this country had ever had, provided we were safely and wisely led out of the depression.

And in conclusion I shall add the following from St. Paul, I Corinthians xv : 49:

> And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, it is with a sense of profound respect that I endeavor to express my feelings over the loss of our esteemed colleague, the Honorable HENRY W. WATSON. While his death on the afternoon of August 27, 1933, caused sorrow to his wide circle of associates in the House, to me it meant the passing of a close friend, a wise counselor, a loyal supporter.

Previous to 1932 the Ninth Congressional District of Pennsylvania comprised the counties of Bucks and Montgomery. From 1914 to 1932, Mr. Watson represented this district with outstanding ability. As a result of a reapportionment, Montgomery County became a separate congressional district, and I was honored in being elected as the first Congressman from the new district. Words fail me in paying my appreciation to my predecessor for his guidance and counsel and for the spirit of unselfish service which characterized his cooperation in the early days of my congressional experience. Though no longer a part of his district, Mr. Watson's interest in Montgomery County and her welfare continued to the day of his death; and in his passing, not only his district but the entire Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the Nation lost a devoted, conscientious public servant.

Mr. Watson was a worthy representative of one of the oldest and most prominent families in eastern Pennsylvania. His great-great-grandfather, Dr. Thomas Watson, came from High Moor, Cumberland County, England, in 1701, and settled in Bucks County, Pa. On his maternal side, Mr. Watson was a lineal descendant of Sir Nicholas Bacon, lord keeper to Queen Elizabeth.

Our colleague was born June 24, 1856, and received an excellent academic education. Upon the completion of his collegiate training he read law under Hon. F. Carroll Brewster, a leader of the Philadelphia Bar. In 1881, Mr. WATSON was admitted to practice and immediately gained the confidence of a wide and influential clientele. He became identified with many civic and public institutions and contributed unselfishly in service to the development of noteworthy county and State projects. His election to Congress in 1914 was a fitting recognition of years of devotion to the public welfare. His record here in the House stands out as an enviable one for industry, application, and understanding.

Mr. WATSON was always a strong and loyal Republican. He contended at all times for its principles. He justified his espousal of party position by logical and forceful argument. He was recognized by his party leaders as an able advocate and rewarded for his ability by appointment to the Ways and Means Committee. Republicanism has lost a stanch supporter.

To me it has meant the loss of a loyal friend, and such losses are irreparable.

> Sunset and evening star,
> And one clear call for me!
> And may there be no moaning of the bar,
> When I put out to sea,
> But such a tide as moving seems asleep,
> Too full for sound and foam,
> When that which drew from out the boundless deep > Turns again home.
> Twilight and evening bell,
> And after that the dark!
> And may there be no sadness of farewell,
> When I embark;
> For tho' from out our bourne of Time and Place
> The flood may bear me far,
> I hope to see my Pilot face to face
> When I have crossed the bar.

LYNN SEDWICK HORNOR

Mr. SMITH of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, on September 23, 1933, this Congress suffered the loss of one of its most useful and esteemed Members when Hon. LYNN SEDWICK HORNOR, Representative from the Third District of West Virginia, passed away in Washington, D.C. His untimely death closed a brief but honored public service to his State and Nation.

As a member of the committee appointed by the House of Representatives, I attended his funeral at his residence in Clarksburg, W.Va., and the great throng of friends who were there from all parts of the State to pay their last tribute of respect was evidence of the esteem in which he was regarded by those who knew him best.

Representative HORNOR was a native of Harrison County, W.Va., where he was born November 3, 1877. His entire life was spent in that community. He attended the public schools and other institutions of learning in his home city, and after diligent application equipped himself to become one of the outstanding business men of West Virginia. From a humble beginning and without financial aid he amassed a considerable fortune, but with which he was always liberal, and many struggling youths of his home county were aided by him in their efforts to obtain an education.

No one will ever presume to claim for LYNN HORNOR that he was outstanding in the Congress of the United States, but he was a gentleman of modest mien, on whose judgment one could well rely. He did not invite public acclaim and only consented to become a candidate for Congress at the urgent demand of his fellow citizens, who best knew his ability and integrity, and believed that his election was certain, despite his membership in the minority party of his district. His ability was early recognized in the House, and he was appointed on the following important committees: Mines and Mining, District of Columbia, Labor, Census, Public Buildings and Grounds, and Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress.

After his election to the Seventy-second Congress he worked untiringly for the enactment of legislation that would benefit his constituents, and his health was impaired to such an extent that he requested his party to select someone else to succeed him in the Seventy-third Congress. But he was again nominated over his protest and triumphantly elected by an increased majority. Continued ill health kept him from attending but few meetings of the extraordinary session of the present Congress.

Representative HORNOR was one of the most lovable characters it has been my pleasure to know. His acquaintance was soon general with all his colleagues, and this body has not lost a Member who will be more generally missed and mourned.

Mr. EDMISTON. Mr. Speaker, having been elected to succeed the Honorable LYNN SEDWICK HORNOR of the Third Congressional District of West Virginia, and on behalf of the West Virginia delegation in Congress, I desire to pay a tribute to the memory of my distinguished predecessor.

LYNN SEDWICK HORNOR was born in Harrison County, W.Va., on November 3, 1877, the son of Ferdinand N. and Mary E. Hood Hornor. He is survived by his wife, formerly Miss Emma N. Hume, of Washington, D.C.

Mr. HORNOR early in life became actively engaged in the industrial development of the State of West Virginia, and particularly in the county of Harrison. For a number of years he was teller of the Traders Bank at Clarksburg, W.Va., which was one of the leading banking institutions in the Monongahela Valley at that time. Mr. HORNOR grew and developed with his native community, and his interests increased with such development. He was not only a banker; he was interested in real estate; took an active part in the development of the coal, oil, and gas industries in central West Virginia; formed and became actively associated with the establishment of several very successful manufacturing enterprises. While busily engaged in all these things, he always had time to serve his community in other respects. He was president of the Clarksburg Board of Trade, and it was during his tenure of such office that many worth-while industries were persuaded to build factories in Clarksburg. He was an active member of Christ Episcopal Church and a member of several fraternal organizations. In fact, he was never too busy to lend not only his financial aid but his personal effort in behalf of any activity that he believed would contribute to the betterment of the community in which he lived. In the later years of his life he was vice president of the United Carbon Co., being one of the founders of that company, together with other personal friends who had long been associated with him in the gas business in West Virginia. While Mr. HORNOR was always interested in public questions, he himself never sought public office until he was persuaded to run for Congress and was elected a Member of the Seventy-second Congress. He was reelected a Member of the Seventy-third Congress, during which session he died, on September 23, 1933.

Mr. HORNOR will not only be missed by his family and a host of close personal friends, but he will be also greatly missed by a large number of people to whom he rendered financial assistance. He made no show whatever of any charitable deeds which he performed, and but few people know the extent of his philanthropies, because he held such things very sacred. He was a person to whom the general public felt it could turn, knowing that anyone who sought him for assistance would be received kindly and in most cases substantially relieved.

Mr. HORNOR'S record as a statesman, business man, and philanthropist was such as but few men ever equaled. He was in every respect the sort of son of whom West Virginia may justly be proud and the type of man future generations should strive to emulate.

While his colleagues in the House of Representatives miss him greatly, and often so express themselves, the greatest tribute to him, in my mind, is the fact that he will be missed the most "back home."

Mr. Speaker, I include as a part of my address the following tribute to Mr. HORNOR'S life and character by Hon. Robert L. Hogg, a former Member of the House from the Fourth District of West Virginia:

One of the natural impulses of man is to complain of his adversity and lament of his losses. But when we mourn the passing of a true friend, we bring into bold relief his virtues and the qualities of manhood that have woven the silken threads of affectionate attachment, which the hand of Fate has so ruthlessly severed.

Today the legislative machinery of a great nation is silenced in commenmoration of the lives and characters of colleagues who have been summoned from their fields of service. We again live with them in the past. Time shuts out the blinding light of partisanship. Our departed friends are appraised by true standards of worth, uninfluenced by the blighting powers of sectionalism or the hypocritical standard of political differences. They stand forth as men, differing possibly in details but all united in a conscientious effort to solve the problems of the country they loved and served.

LYNN S. HORNOR now stands before us as such a man. He was my friend as he was the friend of all who knew him. He is gone. Silence today as the House pays this formal tribute to his memory, is to stifle beyond restraint a desire to express my appreciation of his life, his character, and his record. The cold facts of a biographical sketch are not recorded through ties of friendship. What a man does in life does not stand as a tribute to his memory unless these deeds are evidences of his character. Such a biography may be written of LYNN S. HORNOR. Born during a period of industrial awakening, his life's work was one of advancement of his native State and especially of the community in which he lived. He cleared his path before him. The tools he used were of his own making. His efforts were crowned with success, and during his entire career he bore a reputation of unquestioned honesty. In all his contacts he inspired confidence. His antagonists in business were frequently his close personal friends. They trusted and believed him.

After years of success in business, at a time when he might rightly expect a relaxation of his efforts, he assumed the arduous duties of public office. To this new field he carried the same sense of honesty, sacrifice, and devotion which characterized his private life. The merciless and distorting factors in partisan politics never tarnished his name. The searching lights of public office revealed no flaws in his private or public life but rather brought to the front the high type of his character.

As one of his former colleagues, I join with the hosts of his friends in expressing a profound feeling of personal loss. We are overcome by that empty feeling of helplessness when we ponder over the Divine plan which takes from us a noble character.

Yet we are consoled with the knowledge that there remain throughout the corridors of our Capitol, as well as over the highways and byways of his native State, indelible evidences of his journey through life. The poet aptly reminds us of his living memory with these words:

I shot an arrow into the air,
It fell to earth, I knew not where;
For, so swiftly it flew, the sight
Could not follow it in its flight.

I breathed a song into the air,
It fell to earth, I knew not where;
For who has sight so keen and strong
That it can follow the flight of song?

Long, long afterward, in an oak
I found the arrow, still unbroke;
And the song, from beginning to end,
I found again in the heart of a friend.

LYNN S. HORNOR'S character was a song—now enshrined in the hearts of his friends.

I also include the following letter received by me from Hon. John J. Cornwell, of Baltimore, former Governor of the State of West Virginia:

THE BALTIMORE & OHIO RAILROAD CO.,
OFFICE OF GENERAL COUNSEL,
Baltimore, Md., April 24, 1934.

HON. ANDREW EDMISTON, Jr.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MAJOR: I understand memorial services to deceased House Members will be held Friday next. Assuming you will have something to say with respect to your predecessor, who was my friend as he was yours, I am sorry I cannot be present to hear you.

While LYNN HORNOR, I am told, was respected by his associates in the House because of his genial personality and understanding of public questions, were I called upon to speak of him I would emphasize particularly his integrity and usefulness as a private citizen.

While your State and mine can boast of many native sons, most of whom remain within her borders but many of whom have established homes elsewhere, who are an honor and credit to her, none excell in the fine qualities of citizenship the one whose memory you will honor.

While he was a business man in the true sense of the term, he was likewise a patriotic, public-spirited citizen, a home builder and a home lover. His example was worth all the preachments of a platoon of those who would reform the world with advice, alone.

Modest, unpretentious, unassuming, his life was an inspiration to all who touched it.

You are fortunate in having inherited the tradition he established of a faithful public servant.

Respectfully,

JOHN J. CORNWELL.

TRIBUTE TO LYNN S. HORNOR BY HUGH IKE SHOTT, FORMER MEMBER OF THE HOUSE FROM THE FIFTH DISTRICT OF WEST VIRGINIA

It was my privilege to serve with LYNN S. HORNOR in the Seventy-second Congress. I knew him well. He was every inch a man and a Representative diligent in his duties and ever mindful of the high obligation of American citizenship. He held a first-rank place in patriotism and veneration for the institutions and traditions of West Virginia. He was alive to every opportunity to be of service to his district and his people. Others will review his career in business and industry, and tell the fine story of his public and private life, but I want to testify to an acquaintanceship in which LYNN HORNOR grew stronger in my esteem and confidence, and in which his association became more valued and an influence that bettered and inspired from the morning of the first day until the last, the afterglow of which still paints the sky.

I wish that he might have lived to come into that greater usefulness his enthusiastic desire and his training in Congress would have developed. West Virginia lost a splendid son, and those who knew him lost a friendship unspoiled by any ungracious act of his. Only the wayward and the faithless really die, but those with beauty of attitude and sublimity of hope shall put on immortality beyond the stars.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, it is with more than formal duty that I ask permission to pay tribute to the late Hon. LYNN S. HORNOR. He was not only my colleague in Congress, but he was a lifelong friend as well. Both my father and my grandfather were business associates of Mr. HORNOR. He was a leader in many of the largest industrial and business enterprises of Harrison County, where I was born. He was successful in accumulating a substantial fortune, and I am sure that it all came as the result of useful service rendered by him. He was a member of a very large family of Hornors, all of whom have distinguished themselves in some sort of useful endeavor which has been of service to our State. On the floor of the House Mr. HORNOR was always pleasant, and those who knew him there recognized him to be an able and honorable statesman, and I am sure that his colleagues have been greatly grieved, as I have been, by his untimely death. I cherish his memory and shall always be grateful for the influence he had upon me as a friend.

JOHN DAVENPORT CLARKE

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the New York delegation in this Congress has been bereft of two of its Members, both having been summoned away from us suddenly, and within a brief time of each other, our friends and colleagues, JOHN DAVENPORT CLARKE and JAMES SOUTHWORTH PARKER. To the latter's long and useful service in this House I have paid feeble tribute.

And now I would also bow my head and pay tribute to my friend JOHN CLARKE. His was of a sunny, happy nature. Here he relieved many a somber, prosaic occasion with pleasantry, and oftentimes his quick wit and humor relieved tension and created laughter. No one could be in the company of JOHN CLARKE without feeling the benign influence of his smile and his kindly nature. He fairly exuded good will and fraternal feeling. To him life was a grand adventure, full of interest and very much worth while. If ever he was despondent or discouraged, as probably he was at times, he carefully concealed his feelings under an outward cloak of cheerfulness, for his philosophy was to radiate encouragement and to impart hope. To his friends who were acquainted with his life's work, this disposition of our late colleague to be a friend of man was not surprising. It was because he loved nature and natural things and the highest form of natural life—man himself; it was also because he kept close to mother earth and studied practically the riches enfolded in her bosom and the secrets of her bountiful gifts to mankind and because he had contact and experience with the soil that he aimed to apply his knowledge as a legislator for the betterment of conditions in agricultural pursuits, from whence is derived whatever measure of prosperity the people enjoy. JOHN CLARKE was an agriculturist in the broadest sense of the word; as some people would say, "a real dirt farmer."

The Greek myths, many of them, tell the story of strength renewed by touching the earth. In this country and, in fact, in all countries, in the main, the men who lead in achievements are of the generation or near to a generation that has touched the earth.

But it was not alone as an agriculturalist or dirt farmer that our friend JOHN CLARKE distinguished himself, although that classification itself would have given him the place of prominence he held in this House as a reliable authority on that and kindred subjects, for, in addition to his knowledge of farming, he was also deeply interested in the treasures hidden in the bowels of the earth, far below its surface, and before taking up the practice of law was engaged in a number of mining pursuits and identified as an officer in various mining companies. He was versatile. Before taking up any business or profession, he qualified in a post-graduate course in economics, thus laying a splendid foundation for the lines of work in which he was most interested and could be the happiest and most useful to his fellow men and for which he felt he was best suited. His natural bent was agriculture in its diversified forms, and so he became actively engaged in the cultivation and management of a farm which he acquired in Delaware County, N.Y., where he was born and where he received his early education. He possessed a broad and comprehensive knowledge of farming in all its ramifications; but if there was any one phase of the subject of more interest and concern to him than another, it was dairying. In this branch of the business he was a recognized expert, which led to a directorship in the Dairymen's League, and the chairmanship of that organization for 2 years.

Being an ardent lover of nature in its manifold forms, he was, of course, interested in trees and was profoundly concerned about all that pertained to forestry and the conservation of our watersheds. He became vice president and president of the New York Forestry Association and vice president of the New York Conservation Association. He was coauthor with Senator MCNARY of the law that established the reforestation policy of the United States, which is administered in cooperation with nearly every State, and in our Territories and possessions.

Is it any wonder, therefore, with this rich background of experience and resultant knowledge of the science of agriculture and its related phases, that JOHN CLARKE was selected for service on the Committee on Agriculture of the House, and that on that committee he rendered valuable service while both a majority and minority member? In the committee room in the formulation of legislation he was quick to apply his scientific knowledge, and members, regardless of party, were glad to follow his advice. While on the floor of the House, in the consideration of bills affecting agriculture or cognate subjects, he did not exploit his knowledge, he was always alert and ready to speak and to offer constructive suggestions; and when he did speak, he received attention and spoke to the point, as would be expected of one who knew his subject. He was regarded an authority on those subjects to which he had devoted long study and practical application—agriculture, forestry, and mining. His advice and wise counsel in our deliberations are missed, but more than anything else about him we miss the man himself and the good cheer and friendliness of his genial disposition.

In Republican councils also he leaves a pleasant memory of his efficient services as secretary of the Republican caucus.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, today we rest our activities to pay tribute to the Members of this House whom death has called, and it is fitting and proper that we should render this tribute of official respect to our dead.

I give my tribute of deep affection to the late JOHN DAVENPORT CLARKE.

The years of our association in the House of Representatives by no means cover the period of our friendship. I knew him probably earlier than any other Member of this body, for we prepared for college together at Phillips Academy, Andover, where we were both interested in athletics, and the bond so commenced ripened into long friendship. I have rarely known a man who reacted more fully to friendship than did JOHN CLARKE, and I am proud and honored to have been numbered among his friends.

JOHN CLARKE was completely and typically American, endowed with a good mind, a warm heart, and an unquenchable ardor for living, complemented by keen wit and enviable humor, which carried him over many rough places. His personal charm drew to him many who, like myself, held him in warm admiration and affection.

JOHN CLARKE was loyal to his political party. He was imbued with a spirit of helpfulness and was infused with the finest Americanism in his tolerance of others. His intelligence and common sense won for him general confidence and esteem, while his unfailing friendliness made him universally beloved.

Throughout his service in the House, CLARKE championed the cause of the farmers. His was a thorough understanding of their needs. He lent his untiring efforts to the solving of the problems of agriculture; was the farmers' friend in the highest sense. Had he no other accomplishment, this will remain a monument to his memory, one with which he would be well content.

John's work is appropriately and ably continued by Mrs. CLARKE, who has been elected to fill his place, a graceful tribute to him by the people whom he represented in the Congress.

A man of the people, JOHN CLARKE indulged no consciousness of superiority; separated from them neither by pride nor eccentricity he was incapable of arrogance. He was conversant with the strivings of his constituency and eagerly worked for their prosperity. He exemplified in his office the spirit of brotherly understanding, clothed it with a garment of gentleness, common sense, and sympathy—the stamp of American character.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, Representative JOHN D. CLARKE, whose death we mourn today, was one of nature's big-hearted men. We know his fine legislative record. He was an outstanding and successful lawyer before coming to Congress. The constituency which he so ably represented loved him as a kindly neighbor and thoughtful friend.

Endowed as he was with the faculty of radiating sunshine, his irresistible good humor calmed many tempestuous debates over highly controversial questions in Congress.

He was a man of deep convictions in regard to public questions. The work which he sponsored along the lines of agriculture, conservation, forestry, and mining was of a highly constructive character. I believe it is conservative to say that he was one of the foremost exponents of forestry in the Empire State. The successful legislation which he sponsored in Congress has a survival value. The program of conservation which he launched will benefit many generations yet unborn.

I know that I express the sentiments of the Members of this House when I say that the untimely death of our dear colleague is felt by each of us as a personal loss.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, JOHN D. CLARKE represented the Thirty-fourth District of New York State for 10 years until the time of his death. It was my privilege, as a member of the committee appointed by the Speaker, to attend the services which were held for him at Delhi, within a few miles of his home. I have never seen a larger nor more impressive attendance on such an occasion. It bore evidence of the sincere affection which the people of his own community had for JOHN CLARKE.

He was a kind man; and when I first came to Congress, he went out of his way to make things comfortable for me and to make me feel at ease. He did that with everyone with whom he became acquainted, and his circle of friends in the House was unlimited. He will be missed by all of us.

JOHN CLARKE left his undeniable imprint on agricultural legislation which was passed during his service here. He was a member of the Agricultural Committee during his entire service, was the author of the reforestation bill, and took a very active part in all measures which were brought forward for farm relief and to help adjust the agricultural problems.

He was always sincere, always active, energetic, and faithful to the interests of his constituents. I do not believe any Member of Congress ever worked harder or more devotedly than he did.

We all regret his being taken away from us at a time when men of his sterling qualities are so badly needed.

As indicative of the high regard in which JOHN CLARKE was held by his home people, I append a copy of the minutes adopted by the Kiwanis Club of Endicott, N.Y., where he was a general favorite:

Whereas we the members of the Endicott Kiwanis Club do feel deeply grieved over the untimely passing of our late beloved friend and fellow Kiwanian, JOHN D. CLARKE; and

Whereas he has by his faithfulness, honesty, ability, and friendliness won a deep place in the heart of every Kiwanian who will keenly miss his gracious presence at our meetings; and

Whereas the people of our community and the entire congressional district whom he so capably and unselfishly served as their Representative in Congress, have sustained a great loss in his passing: Be it

Resolved, That the Endicott Kiwanis Club express its profound sorrow and regret for his tragic death and that this resolution be spread upon the secretary's minutes: And be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the members of his family and to the Memorial Committee of Congress.

Mr. WHITLEY. Mr. Speaker, in the passing of JOHN DAVENPORT CLARKE the State of New York and the National Government have lost an able and faithful servant. He was known to all of us and beloved by all of us, especially those who knew him best and were privileged with intimacy in his sparkling everyday life. He was endowed with a singular faculty for making and retaining friends. JOHN DAVENPORT CLARKE is now a mere name and memory, a name representing nothing more than a green mound in an acre where we all have our dear ones.

Only a name! Yet that name calls before us a life lived, a record made, and honors achieved. His years were crowded with much work, much business, much politics, but in them was the joy of life, the happiness of seeing efforts crowned with success. An abounding geniality made Mr. CLARKE one of the pleasantest of men to meet.

To us, who knew him so well, it seems strange and out of place, indeed, to think of him shrouded and silent in the darkness of the grave; he, who but yesterday, as it were, was one of us and with us, so full of life, so strong, so hearty; whose handclasp conveyed so much of friendship.

In this House he was never known to champion an unjust cause, to vote other than according to the whisperings of conscience. His political, as well as his social and business life, was all frank, open, and aboveboard. No secrecy, no subterranean wirepulling, no plots hatched at midnight for him—all was as open as the day, as clear as the noontide.

Mr. CLARKE was a man of independent thought and action. He acted after consideration and firm conviction, well founded. He was not like a weathercock, turning hither and thither, swayed by every popular breeze, but was rather a leader of public opinion. He could and did express his opinion upon legislative questions intelligently and fearlessly. No man could swerve him from the path of duty as he saw it, and none could deliver him on any question. Let me here put my convictions on record in the expression that in all places and at all times, and in the largest and truest sense, he was an honest man and an incorruptible public servant. Fidelity to principle was the chart of his life; discharge of duty, the rule of his action. While not pretentious in the expression of his convictions, he maintained them with inflexible firmness—not with a firmness born of self-conceit, but that which is prompted by a consciousness of right and modest merit. He was safe, reliable, and useful.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, last fall we were all shocked to hear of the sudden and untimely passing of one of our most beloved colleagues, the Honorable JOHN DAVENPORT CLARKE, of New York. I take this opportunity to pay tribute to his memory.

Although his death came much too soon, JOHN CLARKE enjoyed a full and active lifetime. He possessed a genuine character and a rare sense of good humor that won him friends everywhere. JOHN CLARKE was a lover of the soil. Beginning humbly on a farm, he never lost sight in all his years of public service of the agricultural problems. His mellow philosophy smacked of those hardy pioneers who founded this great Nation and the sturdy farmers who have perpetuated the real spirit of America and preserved for the future our democratic institutions. Much of his versatile career was spent in the interest of nature. The milestones which mark his life show many pursuits in behalf of the welfare of our natural resources. Interested in forestry and conservation, he became president of the New York Forestry Association and later vice president of the New York Forestry Conservation Association. At another time he was chairman of the board of directors of the Dairymen's League in New York State.

JOHN CLARKE served in the Congress for six terms. During those years I came to know him well. But I am only one of many who have served here for many years and who shall keenly miss his cheerful countenance and welcome word. For several years he was a member of the Committee on Agriculture, and he became an outstanding authority on the legislation which came before that important committee. Quite naturally, his chief interests centered around agriculture, forestry, and mining, and his contributions and counsel in connection with such legislation carried real weight on the floor of the House.

His widow, Mrs. CLARKE, is filling his place. We welcome her and extend every cordial good wish for her success in the work of her illustrious husband. JOHN CLARKE was an intelligent legislator, a happy companion, and a clean, hard-fighting partisan.

We all shall miss him.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, the passing of our beloved colleague, JOHN DAVENPORT CLARKE, is an occasion of keen sorrow and regret, not only to his immediate constituency but also to his colleagues in the House of Representatives. His passing involves a grievous loss to the cause of forestry in America. It is likewise a heavy loss to the cause of agriculture, in which he had a deep and abiding interest.

He was the father of the Clarke-McNary bill, which established the national reforestation policy of the United States now being cooperated in by 41 States, together with Hawaii and Puerto Rico. He was instrumental in the passage of legislation which at first salvaged what remained of our great natural wealth in forests and then instituted a program of reforestation to restore to America the timber which had been so ruthlessly destroyed.

Owing to his efforts, forest economics is now receiving much attention by Congress and the various States. He was a master of all the technique which had to do with the question. He was an expert in the matter of forest protection through the operation of control measures. He was among the first to appreciate the necessity of new plantings in order to prevent soil erosion and to effect the preservation of our various watersheds. This, to my mind, was the great constructive work of JOHN D. CLARKE'S life. He loved the great open spaces, and his efforts in this direction were influenced by a desire to pass the accomplishments on for the benefit and happiness of posterity.

There is no man in the history of Congress who was held in deeper esteem by his constituents. The impressive scenes at his funeral and the obvious grief of all participants indicated most clearly the affection in which he was held. His passing is a distinct loss to the Congress and to the cause of forestry.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege and honor to be among the acquaintances and friends of the late lamented Congressman JOHN D. CLARKE, and I should be doing violence to the memory of that friendship did I not on this occasion pay my tribute of love and respect. Once more death has entered our ranks, found a shining mark, and with relentless stroke quenched the activities of a busy and useful life. In the flower of his manhood his passing was, indeed, untimely. He was a man of true nobility of soul, of fine intellect, character, and ability; a man of strong and true convictions; a man who believed above all in his country. He was a typical native son of the Empire State.

There was nothing of the sham about him; he abhorred hypocrisy; he accomplished results without ostentation. He found recreation, entertainment, and pleasure in outdoor life; he loved to get close to nature. The hills, the valleys, the streams, the mountains—all were majestic to him. He was a great reader, a natural student from childhood, and therefore acquired and retained a wealth of information; he was truly an educated gentleman of the highest type. He will be missed by all who knew him, and his friends were numbered by his acquaintances.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, it is especially fitting that I pay this brief but profoundly sincere tribute to the memory of Hon. JOHN D. CLARKE, late Representative in Congress from the neighboring district to my own—the Thirty-fourth New York District—since I was born in Unadilla, Otsego County, N.Y., a town in that district.

However, my tribute is offered primarily because of my affection and admiration for JOHN CLARKE, rather than because of the mere fact that I happened to first see the light of day only a short distance from the township in which he made his home. If the homes of the two of us had been as far apart as the antipodes, the tribute would be equally in order. And it is all the more earnest because I am a Jeffersonian Democrat and Representative CLARKE was a consistent Republican of the ultraconservative school.

I am today honoring the man, JOHN D. CLARKE, for his lovable, kindly, genial qualities, his generous heart, his helpful disposition, his sound judgment, and his faithful service. I differed fundamentally with him on many points and in my general political philosophy, yet there are few men for whom I have felt warmer attachment and more genuine respect. Such friendship and appreciation are pleasant and commendable incidents that frequently arise in the life of a public man, and fortunate is the political leader who wins the hearty good will and cordiality of those in the opposing party.

Tolerance is one of the finest elements and requirements of the best patriotism. JOHN D. CLARKE manifested this quality to a marked degree. Battling vigorously for the policies in which he believed, he never retained personal bitterness against members of the opposition. Most of us who are Members of the Congress seek to show the same tolerance, but not all of us succeed to the same extent as Congressman CLARKE.

Perhaps no man who ever served in the House of Representatives had more practical experience in agriculture and felt a stronger desire to improve the lot of the farmer and dairyman than the late Representative from the Thirty-fourth District. His thorough familiarity with the problems of the man who tills the soil and furnishes the milk and vegetables and grain for the food of the Nation was recognized by all his associates. His practical common sense and his knack of quickly sizing up a situation were of immense value in the work of lawmaking.

Yet the outstanding qualities of Congressman CLARKE were his lovable, kindly, genial personal qualities to which I have alluded.

Sam Walter Foss, the poet, might well have dedicated to JOHN D. CLARKE—had he been living at the time—his famous poem, House by the Side of the Road, when he wrote:

There are hermit souls that live withdrawn
In the place of their self-content;
There are souls like stars, that dwell apart,
In a fellowless firmament;
There are pioneer souls that blaze their paths
Where highways never ran—
But let me live by the side of the road
And be a friend to man.

Let me live in a house by the side of the road,
Where the race of men go by—
The men who are good and the men who are bad,
As good and as bad as I.
I would not sit in the scorner's seat,
Or hurl the cynic's ban—
Let me live in a house by the side of the road
And be a friend to man.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, to those who knew JOHN CLARKE casually the quality that distinguished him was his unfailing cheerfulness. He radiated good cheer. No matter what his own troubles might be, he always showed the world a gay and carefree exterior. Men welcomed his society, for there could be no gloom in JOHN CLARKE'S presence.

Only those who knew the man himself realized that he had a deeply religious nature. While still strong and vigorous and with no intimation of impending tragedy, he wrote detailed instructions for his own funeral services, which were faithfully carried out by his lifelong friend, Rev. W. Courtland Robinson, in the little Presbyterian Church, at Delhi, N.Y. He requested that the funeral sermon should be brief and should "emphasize that without service life has no significance. I have kept the faith and expect that the trees will sing my requiem mass as my soul soars on, for I have an abiding faith in our Master and the future life." In these solemn words he revealed the simple creed by which he lived—service to his fellowman and faith in the life to come.

He had an active and varied career, and his success was not without struggle. He was a lawyer, mining executive, farmer, and Member of Congress, and with characteristic zest and enthusiasm entered into the numerous movements for civic and social welfare of his district. In Congress he became the ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture and particularly interested himself in legislation which promoted conservation or reforestation or benefited dairy farmers, but he was alert and aggressive in protecting the great industrial interests of his district as well as in giving service to his humblest constituent.

His service in Congress is an honorable record of devotion to duty and useful accomplishment, but we will remember our friend for his happy, sunny disposition, his generous impulses, his truly democratic spirit, and the joy of his companionship.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, JOHN D. CLARKE was one of the most companionable men I ever knew. He was a universal favorite in the House of Representatives and counted his many friends on both sides of the Chamber.

He was graduated in economics and history from Colorado College, which he attended after graduating from Lafayette College of Easton, Pa. He was afterward graduated in law from the Brooklyn Law School. Always interested in agricultural pursuits, he purchased a farm in his native county of Delaware in 1915.

His services on the Agricultural Committee of the House were most valuable, and he brought to the consideration of its legislation a practical knowledge of the farmer and his problems. The restoration of our American forests was his particular hobby, and the Clarke-McNary bill that he introduced and which became a law carried out his plan for national reforestation.

He had a keen sense of humor, and his quips and impromptu poetry added a lighter vein to the somber and technical discussions in committee and on the floor of the House. "We shall mourn and we shall miss him."

JAMES SOUTHWORTH PARKER

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, no truer words ever were uttered than these: "In the midst of life we are in death." My late colleague, JAMES SOUTHWORTH PARKER, or as he was familiarly and affectionately known to us, JIM PARKER, was beckoned away from us suddenly, almost without warning, by the summons that cannot go unheeded. Just a few days before being stricken he was in my office at a conference, and there was then no intimation or warning of his impending departure. His separation from us was a shock to me and to his friends here and to his constituents whom he had served so well and so long.

JIM PARKER'S career in the House, covering a period of nearly 11 consecutive terms or 22 years, exemplifies the value of long service in the House, which the late Speaker Champ Clark emphasized as important to the country in the case of a Member who demonstrates his fitness, as did our colleague, Mr. PARKER.

At the time of his death only 6 men outranked him in point of service and only 8 others equaled his record. He preceded me by 2 years, and in those 2 years got his bearings, so that he was enabled somewhat to master the intricacies of legislative procedure and customs and to impart his knowledge to fledgling colleagues, which he did most cheerfully and obligingly I being among the Members who received the benefit of his information and advice.

He and I became stanch friends and coworkers. We had much in common; our congressional districts were contiguous and our local interests identical. And in our political philosophy we thought very much alike. Through 2 decades of service in the House we were yoked together in a common bond of personal and political aims and objectives. During 8 years of that time we served in the minority, including the period of the World War, and this experience without the responsibility of party leadership was a season of valuable preparation for the exacting and responsible duties that were to fall to his lot and to mine in the succeeding years of Republican control of the House.

Representing, as Mr. PARKER did, a part of the great State of New York, with its multifarious industries and interests in every field of human endeavor, and particularly in the realm of commerce, both domestic and international, it was most fitting that the State of New York should be represented on the great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with its broad jurisdiction of matters relating to our domestic and foreign commerce. By assiduous application to the duties imposed upon him by membership on that committee and by unremitting study of the many complex questions presented to it, Mr. PARKER increased in wisdom and mental stature, and from a lowly position on the committee he rose to the highly important, influential, and responsible post of chairman.

During his chairmanship unusually great, far-reaching, and vexatious questions affecting the welfare of the country arrested the attention of the committee. The question of commercial aviation, then practically in the experimental stage, was one demanding consideration in the realm of transportation facilities—a new and untrodden path in the matter of legislation. By virtue of his position as Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and in recognition of the value of Mr. PARKER'S experience and broad knowledge of transportation problems, President Coolidge, in 1926, appointed him as a member of what was designated the "President's Aircraft Board." This Board held its meetings, over which Mr. PARKER presided with tact and ability, in his committee rooms; and after lengthy hearings, Chairman PARKER submitted a report covering 1,500 pages, embodying recommendations. This was a pioneer movement.

Upon the suggestion of Mr. PARKER and at his insistence, the House, in the Seventy-first Congress, authorized the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the ownership and capital interests in any common carrier engaged in transportation of persons or property in interstate commerce. This was a herculean task, to which Mr. PARKER and his associates devoted themselves in and out of season; the subject was highly technical and intricate, requiring close application, intensive study, and expert knowledge. Nothing daunted him, however. Mr. PARKER, with characteristic zeal and energy entered upon this self-imposed task with determination, and I cannot but feel that his labors in this respect superinduced the insidious physical ailment that resulted in his sudden break down. It may therefore be said literally that he died at his post of duty. The results of his labors in this one respect alone, as embodied in his reports and speeches on the subject, are illuminating and will be found of inestimable value in the consideration of transportation problems.

Mr. Speaker, in the councils of his party in the House JIM PARKER was prominent. As the New York member of the Republican Committee on Committees, he represented our delegation with rare judgment and wise discrimination. He was always frank, candid, and fair, and in him his colleagues reposed absolute confidence and sought his advice.

Personally, I feel greatly the loss of his support and his sage wisdom in party councils as well as his cooperation in legislative matters. When in retrospect I review my association with my friend and colleague over a period of 20 years, I can think of no man who was more devoted, more conscientious, more energetic, or more unselfishly wedded to his great tasks than was JIM PARKER.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, if we are to continue to be a great nation and to perpetuate it, there is no method by which that end may be attained except by the earnest efforts of sincere, devoted, and patriotic men. Hon. JAMES S. PARKER, of New York State, whose death we mourn today, was of this type. The service he rendered here was during the most critical time in our Nation's history, the period of the World War, when the stress and strain on the mind and body of every legislator was terrific. The conclusion of the war did not lessen the burden of his official duties, but added to them. Even though he was endowed with a splendid and powerful physique, it was finally bent, and at last broke under the heavy and ever-increasing load of official responsibilities.

The rugged honesty of Representative PARKER commanded respect. He was strong in his convictions and very aggressive in fighting for them. He brought to this House a storehouse of legislative information. His distinguished service in the State Legislature of New York enabled him to give wise counsel touching many intricate problems relating to questions in which the State and the National Government had a common interest. This Nation can ill afford to lose the services of such a man.

The constituency which he loved and served so faithfully gave evidence of their confidence in his integrity and ability by returning him to Congress over a long period of years. The legislative record of Representative PARKER speaks for itself. No man could have transacted the business of his constituency with greater fidelity than did he. I say this advisedly, because he was unremitting in his toil and never faltered in his attention to his official duties until ill health made it impossible for him to carry on further.

I feel that I have lost a very dear personal friend. I knew him, and knew him well, for more than a quarter of a century. I am proud to have known him. It is enough to say that in every respect he measured up to the highest expectations of his friends and fulfilled in the highest degree the standards required of a worthy and distinguished citizen.

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. Mr. Speaker, as we assemble in this Chamber to pay tribute to the memories of our departed colleagues, we become conscious of the value of their associations and services and of the responsibilities and duties left by them to us. We apprize and appreciate the dead, free from the grosser attributes of human nature. In death all are equal—prince and mendicant, sultan and slave, sage and simple—all march to the same music through that grim and ghostly cordon beyond which we may well all meet when the sun goes down.

Death is a true and pure democracy. In the democracy of the dead all men at last are equal. There is neither rank, station, nor prerogative in the republic of the grave. At this fatal threshold the philosopher ceases to be wise, and the song of the poet is silent. The poor man is as rich as the richest, and the rich man is as poor as the pauper. There the proud man surrenders his dignities; the statesman, his honors; the worldling, his pleasures; the invalid, his rack; and the laborer rests from unrequitted toil.

Here at last is nature's final decree in equity. The wrongs of time are redressed. Injustice is expiated; the irony of fate refuted. The mightiest captain succumbs to that invincible adversary who disarms alike the victor and the vanquished.

It therefore becomes my sad duty today to recall briefly the life, character, and accomplishments of him who as a Member of this great body I had the privilege of knowing intimately and well, JAMES SOUTHWORTH PARKER. Born in Great Barrington, Mass., June 3, 1867, and educated in its public schools, he completed his education at Cornell University. In 1888 moved to Salem, Washington County, N.Y. In 1904 he was elected to the State assembly and served several terms, beginning in that year, up until 1912, when he was elected a Member of Congress. He was reelected to Congress and served continuously until his death, on December 19, 1933. Here he served untiringly not only in the interest of his party but for the greater good of his country. We who were his intimates and friends regret his untimely call to eternal rest and peace.

His family life was an example and inspiration to those favored with the opportunity to observe it. While our hearts go out in sympathy and sorrow to his widow, we would remind her that he left behind a memory of fidelity and love which as time goes on will become as sweet as the fragrance of a perfumed flower. Truly he has left footprints on the sands of time.

Let us, the living, pause and heed the fact of death. Those who yesterday were here have answered the summons to eternity. No man knows but that the tomorrow will never dawn for him. So in the vast company of the dead let us gain from their lives those virtues which in life we cherished most in them, to the end that we may heed the warning:

So live, that when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan, which moves
To that mysterious realm, where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave,
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, JAMES S. PARKER died December 19, 1933. For more than 20 years he had been one of the most valuable Members of the House of Representatives. No man in the House ever had more influence with the Membership in general than did JIM PARKER. His advice was sought on every conceivable subject by members of both parties, and it was always given in the kindliest spirit. No other Member of Congress did as much as he to help make easy the path of the young and inexperienced Member of the House. He would go out of his way on any occasion to do a favor for a friend, and very seldom would the friend forget.

His long service in Congress proves that he faithfully, honestly, and effectively represented his district, the Twenty-ninth District of New York State. The position which he held on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for so long is ample evidence of his great ability in handling intricate problems of legislation. He so held the confidence of the House that when he said a piece of legislation was sound and was needed, it was customary for his declaration to carry great weight with the Membership. When he took part in debate, it was always along constructive lines, and what he had to say was very effective.

For years he was the New York member of the committee on committees; and because of that position, he had a large part in the assignment of new Members of the House to their committees. He had unusually good judgment and was able to size up a man's capacities about as well as anyone I have ever seen. This made him exceedingly valuable not only to his party but also to his country.

In a campaign, his work for the Republican Party was always most effective, and many in the last 35 years have been helped by his interest and support.

We shall all miss him and shall all regret that he was called so soon.

Mr. WHITLEY. Mr. Speaker, Representative PARKER was 66 years of age when he died. He had been in public life almost continuously for 30 years, serving his district in the New York State Legislature and then as a Member of this body since the Sixty-third Congress. This brief statement shows that he was an unusual man. But, Mr. Speaker, he deserved this recognition at the hands of his fellowmen, by the faithful manner in which he discharged every public trust. No request of any constituent ever went unheeded. It was not because of political considerations that he did this but because of his kindness of heart.

Representative PARKER was a kind man. He loved to do good to others for the pleasure it gave him. He was continually sacrificing himself for someone else. No man was too poor to receive his attention. His life was given to the service of others. He believed that it was our duty to pluck the flowers that 'round us grow, scattering fragrance as we go. It was for this reason that he was so universally liked. It was for this reason that he maintained the love of the people whom he represented. It was because of his innumerable, nameless, and unrecorded acts of kindness and of love that so many will long for the touch of the vanished hand and the sound of the voice that is still.

By his unusual executive ability he did much for his State and country. His hosts of friends will appreciate him now the more that he is gone. To his strong character and unimpeachable integrity and honesty must be added a genial disposition; his temper was seldom ruffled. He was calm while others were disturbed. He smiled while others frowned. He was unselfish. The world was brighter because he lived; he gave to life more than he received. With all his graces of mind and character he was a modest man, quiet, and retiring. He was willing that others should indulge in oratorical flights; he was satisfied to be judged by what he did rather than by what he said. He was reticent because he was thoughtful. He loved his fellow man. Is it any wonder that we liked this man and that we mourn his death? This is not a fulsome eulogy perfunctorily delivered but only an imperfect picture of the life of a simple, faithful public servant, whose death has caused genuine sorrow to all who knew him.

Mr. Speaker, to such a one death has no terrors; it is an awakening to a higher life; it is not a good night but rather a good morning.

Green be the turf above thee,
Friend of my better days;
None knew thee but to love thee,
Nor named thee but to praise.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, the death of JAMES S. PARKER removed from Congress an experienced legislator of ability, integrity, and high intelligence. As Chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House, he came to know intimately the transportation and other interstate problems of the American Union. No more intricate, delicate, or difficult problem confronts Congress than the matter of legislating upon the interstate powers and duties of public utilities. A false step or erroneous legislation will either do great injustice to the people of the country who are dependent upon transportation, or it will do economic injustice to the railroads and other common carriers.

During the long period of his service on this committee JAMES S. PARKER held the scales of legislation evenly and fairly. During his day the relation of government to the great transportation corporations changed materially. Owing to his wisdom, his sense of fairness, and outstanding loyalty to what was necessary for the development of America, much necessary and wholesome legislation was enacted by Congress.

Congressman PARKER'S outstanding personal characteristics were courtesy and tolerance. He was painstaking in his efforts to assist his junior colleagues, of whatever party. In his day and generation he made a notable contribution to the orderly commercial development of America. His sound advice and counsel will be greatly missed by his colleagues. His kindly, wholesome personality will continue to be a pleasant memory for all those who contacted him during the years of his service.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, we are assembled at this time in the Halls of Congress, laying aside our legislative duties, to pay deserved tribute and honor to the memory of our departed colleagues.

I feel greatly honored to be chosen to express in my humble way my feeling of admiration and respect for one whom I have been called to succeed and to carry on the duties which he so ably performed.

Coming as I do from the Twenty-ninth Congressional District of the State of New York which has been so long and ably represented by my close personal friend and adviser, the Honorable JAMES SOUTHWORTH PARKER, it is fitting and proper that I, in behalf of the district, pay proper tribute to his memory.

My acquaintance with JIM PARKER, as he was affectionately known to all his friends, began when I was yet a very young man. I well remember his frequent calls upon my father at our home, where he was always a welcome guest. He was gifted with that rare trait of radiant friendliness which left those who were privileged to enjoy his friendship with the feeling that they were better for having known him.

Our district was honored by his services in the New York State Legislature where he served in the assembly for a number of years. His real worth was recognized, and he was chosen to represent this district as a Member of Congress in 1912, where he served continuously until the time of his death on December 19, 1933. When news of his sudden passing came to us, it was a severe shock, and the sympathy of the entire community went out to his widow. We had looked forward to many more years of his valued services in public life. Personally, I have always looked upon my friend JIM PARKER as my real adviser, one to whom I could go with my troubles and be sure of sympathetic and sound advice. Congressman PARKER not only was a refined, cultured gentleman but also had the faculty of sympathetic friendship toward his fellow man. He was always ready to be of assistance; in fact, service was his watchword. His character might well be expressed in these words:

Not what you get
But what you give.
Not what you say
But how you live.
Giving the world
The love it needs
Living a life
Of noble deeds.

Not whence you came
But whither bound.
Not what you have
But whether found
Strong for the right,
The good, the true—
These are the things
Worth while to you.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I shall always remember JIM PARKER with affection and gratitude, because of his manly attributes and his many kindnesses to me. He was never too absorbed in his own problems to feel a concern for those of others, particularly of young and inexperienced Members, and he was never too busy to lend a helping hand and an encouraging word.

He was one of the leaders when I first took my seat in Congress—head of the New York delegation, member of committee on committees, Chairman of the important Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. He enjoyed prestige, power, and popularity. But he was too big and too fine to be conscious of his position, too much of the thoroughbred gentleman ever to be arrogant or condescending. He was always kindly JIM PARKER, and he wore his honors gracefully. I doubt whether any Member of the House had more friends than he during his long service here. Good partisan though he was, I do not believe he harbored ill-feeling for any man. There was no place for malice in his nature.

His career as a legislator was long and honorable. For 8 years he served in the legislature at Albany, and he represented his district in Congress for nearly 21 years. His constituents trusted him and delighted in honoring him. Many important pieces of legislation bear the imprint of his sound judgment. In debate he spoke briefly, directly to the point, and without rhetorical flourishes, but with a sincerity that carried conviction.

When others were swept off their feet by sudden fads and popular waves of hysteria, he kept his sanity. JIM PARKER'S influence was considerable, and his contribution in the Nation's councils is of great and permanent value.

Naturally a man of keen perceptions, he offered us the mature judgment which only comes with long years of experience and close application to the legislative work he loved so well. The country has lost a useful and devoted servant, and we mourn the passing of an honored colleague and a good friend.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I want to pay deserved respect to my friend and colleague from New York, Hon. JAMES S. PARKER, who passed away last December.

It was my happy privilege to serve with JIM PARKER during my 16 years in Congress, and I can say with sincerity and from experience that he did his job well and has left a heritage of faithful public service which will be difficult to duplicate.

JIM PARKER served over 20 years as a Member of this House, representing the Twenty-ninth Congressional District of New York. Previous to that he was elected six times to the New York State Legislature. With a careful observation of humanity and a keen interest in the rural classes, he worked his way diligently and honorably to a high place in this body. For many years he was a member of the committee on committees, and his fairness and impartiality won him lifelong friendships in Congress. His excellent services as a ranking member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce stand as another tribute to his hard work and honest efforts. His opinion, when expressed here on the floor, was always held in high regard.

Through our many years of personal friendship and close association I learned on countless occasions the true warmth of his heart and the kindliness of his spirit. New Members, particularly, found in him a genuine friend and counselor. Members of both parties often called on him for advice, and out of his ripe experience and well-seasoned judgment he was forever eager to cooperate and assist.

JIM PARKER will be especially missed by the leaders of his own party, but his memory, too, shall live long in the hearts of all of us who worked so long with him and learned by intimate contact of his legislative ability, his depth of understanding, and his unquestioned integrity.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, it is hard to find the proper words with which to express my feelings concerning Congressman PARKER. He and I were old friends—intimate friends. We met for the first time back in 1905 as members of the New York Legislature. For 6 years I had the pleasure of serving with him in that body. For many months in each of those years we saw each other every day. We were more than mere legislative colleagues; we became intimate friends. That friendship lasted until the day of his death.

As an assemblyman at Albany, Mr. PARKER wielded an important influence. His fine judgment, his ability to analyze legislative proposals, his knowledge of the problems of Government and of business, and the confidence he enjoyed among his colleagues, lifted him quickly to a place of power and responsibility. I remember very well the splendid work he did as chairman of the committee which had in charge a series of bills which, when enacted, brought about fundamental reforms with respect to the relationship existing between public utilities and the State. He was largely responsible for these measures which today stand upon the statute books of New York, and which have proved to be of great usefulness to the people of that great Commonwealth. That was 30 years ago. So vivid is my recollection of him that it seems but yesterday. That recollection of our youngster days is the more vivid, because Mr. PARKER and I took part, shoulder to shoulder, in some exceedingly interesting and hard-fought political battles. I am not sure that we were right in all our contentions, but I know one thing, and that is that JIM PARKER was a square fighter, generous in victory, and smiling in defeat. It was inevitable that he should be promoted. From the New York Legislature he came to Congress, representing that fine congressional district which lies along the eastern boundary of up-State New York—a section of country throbbing with the best of American traditions.

I followed him to Washington in 1915 and found him once more hard at work for all that is best in legislation and in government. While we served at opposite ends of the Capitol in those days, we got together frequently, talked over old times, compared notes, and tried to understand the problems of the Nation as we used to try to understand the problems of the State. Always he was sound; always was his advice valuable. He had a knack of seeing things in their true light, and I found very shortly that his colleagues in the House were having the same confidence in him as his old colleagues in the Albany legislature. I need not review his career as a Member of the House of Representatives. It is long, and it is honorable to the highest degree. He rose to the chairmanship of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and in that position he was one of the most influential public men in Washington. An impress of his sound judgment and his ceaseless industry is to be found upon many a statute of the United States. Through all his labors he exhibited that finest of all capacities, the capacity for friendship. Now that he has gone, it is that element in his character which lives most vividly in my mind. It is that day-to-day friendship which he gave us that we miss most of all. He was so sympathetic; his understanding was so keen; he was so constant. It is a pity that he had to go.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I should feel that I had neglected to perform a duty I owe to the memory of our dear friend, JAMES S. PARKER, were I not to add a brief tribute to his memory.

Representative PARKER was genial in temperament and a delightful man to meet. He made his constituency a good Representative, and his popularity with the people is indicated by his successive elections to Congress by his substantial majorities.

He received political preferment in his home State, was a member of the State legislature for many years before being elected to Congress, and his popularity was ever on the increase, which was indicative of a splendid official service.

He was in such favor with his party, and his services so well recognized, that he became a member of one of the most influential committees in the House—the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce—thus showing his merit was duly appreciated and his ability acknowledged.

His death has removed one of our ablest and most popular Members, and in his death Congress and the country have sustained a severe loss. His departure is sincerely mourned as a national loss; and by those who were associated with him, as well as by those who knew him best, his memory will be cherished as a loyal and delightful friend, a congenial associate, a patriotic and devoted servant to his people, and a lover of his country.

The public have a very meager understanding of the strain to which a Member of the House or Senate is subjected. Those Members among you who have been serving here for even a few terms have seen, time and time again, the health of your comrades shattered, and you have seen them enter an early grave because of the often serious injury to health the services in this body have brought. Under the strain of the labors of political life the health of JAMES S. PARKER gave way, and he surrendered to death.

By his education, experience, and training, based upon his native ability and strong and charming personality, our colleague was equipped for what he became—an ideal Member of Congress.

He deeply respected the wishes of his constituents, and labored manfully to comply with their desires, so far as he could do so without doing injustice to his judgment as to what was right and best.

But I think no fear of political consequences or personal welfare ever turned him from what his own best judgment approved.

But our friend and colleague has passed on to a better world. He sleeps the sleep of the just. He was a good man, a good citizen, a loyal friend, and an able legislator, and in honor of his memory may I say:

Green be the turf above thee,
Friend of my better days;
None knew thee but to love thee,
Nor named thee but to praise.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, few Americans are privileged in public office to serve the people of their State for upwards of 6 years and the people of the Nation as a whole for over 20 years. Hon. JAMES SOUTHWORTH PARKER enjoyed that privilege, commanding the confidence and affection of those whom he served until the very end when death brought to a sudden close his long and useful career of distinction.

He not only won the confidence of those he served at home but also enjoyed throughout the House, regardless of party affiliation, respect and popularity in abundant measure. Those who knew him well will always recall him with high regard and genuine affection.

Ability and industry were his. These qualities brought him to Congress and enabled him to rise in authority in the House until he became chairman of the powerful Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce—a committee which he himself had done much to make powerful.

Judgment was also his—a practical judgment based on years of experience, which made his counsel of especial value in matters of policy.

Understanding and ready sympathy were his, especially for those with less experience in the House.

I knew him first as one of the older Members of the House when first elected to Congress. I shall always recall the hand of friendship which he held out to me at that time—a hand which was always available during 6 years of association in the House.

State and Nation have lost a faithful and effective public servant. Many of us have lost a friend.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, in the passing of Representative JAMES S. PARKER, of Salem, N.Y., not only the Twenty-ninth District but the Congress of the United States suffers a distinct loss. During a continuous service of 21 years, his ability as a legislator and his broad viewpoint on questions of national policy have commanded the respect and admiration of the Members of the House of Representatives.

As Chairman of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee over a long period of years, his executive ability was outstanding. He was possessed of a marked personality, and his advice was sought by many of the leaders in his party. He was endowed with a combination of political acumen and business sense that made him a most valuable member. His friends were legion, and his death was a loss not only to his immediate family and friends but to his district, his State, and the Nation.

Well may the Biblical salutation be his epitaph, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

JOSEPH LAWRENCE HOOPER

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, dare I to rise during this solemn period and attempt a eulogy of that noble soul which until a short time ago dwelt among us within the modest clay habitat that was once the Honorable JOSEPH L. HOOPER, of Michigan.

Realizing, as I do, my limitation of expression, I hesitate, lest in my deficiency I fall short of paying a tribute that is befitting his public service, his sterling character, his exemplary honesty and fairness. I have searched the innermost recesses of my mind so that I might say something that is worthy of his unblemished character and, as in my heart, may remain a lasting tribute to his imperishable soul.

I was privileged to know him and work with him for the brief span of 1 year. In this association I have grown richer in character. Through it I learned to know the finest impulses that motivated his every movement. To be with him at work or at play was a pleasure never to be forgotten, the mellow character and sound philosophy of JOSEPH L. HOOPER were like a glow of light in which I was happy to bask when occasion permitted.

He had served his State and his district loyally, consistently, and with distinction. Partisanship, when the welfare of the people was at stake, was unknown to him. His prime purpose in life was to serve his country and the people. Realizing this, the people of the Third District of Michigan reelected him consistently since the Sixty-ninth Congress. His work in Congress is a record that will be a model and an inspiration to his successor.

The loss of JOSEPH L. HOOPER to the people of the State of Michigan, and particularly to his constituency, is beyond calculation and replacement. I am happy in the thought of having known him, of having associated with him. I feel rich in that I may share the grief of his family. The equity, though small, is priceless.

I believe that what is commonly supposed to be the end is but the beginning of a greater and a more glorious existence. I pray that the Lord may rest his weary soul.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, the death of the Honorable JOSEPH L. HOOPER, of the Third Congressional District of Michigan, removes from public service one of Michigan's most able men in this House of Representatives.

For 10 years he served the constituency of the Third Michigan District ably and well. He was a man possessed of rare intellectual attainments and a retentive memory seldom found among men. He was devoted to his work here in the Congress of the United States and brought to it a polished, legal mind which contributed much through his service on the Judiciary Committee. Using a somewhat ancient phrase, "he was a man of parts", of unquestioned integrity, and possessed of an unusual command of the finest English. He was a man of sterling character and an affable disposition. Always an intense Republican, nevertheless he had the confidence of the men on both sides of the aisle, Democrats and Republicans alike.

As a new Member of this body, it was my privilege to know him intimately but little more than a year; but in that period of time, I came to admire and respect him for his high attainments and manly attributes. He has passed on. He will be remembered by those who knew him best, and he will be missed by all of us who took counsel with him.

The State of Michigan has lost a splendid, stalwart citizen and the Nation an able counselor and legislator. The Third District of Michigan mourns him and misses him.

It can be truly said of Mr. HOOPER, as someone has so aptly put it:

As the years roll by, the milestones become headstones,
And beneath every one a friend.

May we, who remain, be soothed and sustained by that unfaltering faith which attended him, is the wish of one who admired him in life and reveres him in death.

Mr. SADOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of paying a brief and humble tribute to the memory of my distinguished colleague, JOSEPH L. HOOPER, of Battle Creek, who, with marked ability and distinction, for 9 years served in this great legislative body the Third Congressional District of Michigan.

The sudden death of Congressman HOOPER on February 22, 1934, came as a distinct shock to all. Seemingly enjoying his usual good health and in the best of spirits, he spoke before the House of Representatives that afternoon. After the adjournment of the House for the day, he returned to his office, as was his custom, and was later found dead, the result of a heart attack.

Although I had had the pleasure of serving with Mr. HOOPER but one term, I had come to know and respect him as a man of unusually high principles and ideals, one who always followed what he considered to be the path of truth and wisdom. Although we were members of different political parties and were in disagreement on many subjects, I had great admiration for Mr. HOOPER as a man of convictions and courage to back up these convictions.

Our association during my service in Congress was most pleasant, and I deeply mourn the loss of a good friend, with whom I was happy to serve.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, JOSEPH L. HOOPER served in Congress for nearly 10 years from the Third District of Michigan. In the House of Representatives, when his party was in power over the major part of his service, he was frequently called upon to preside when the House was in Committee of the Whole. He made one of the ablest presiding officers we had; always courteous, dignified, and always had himself in hand. His knowledge of parliamentary law was probably as great as that of any other Member of the House. He took a keen interest in his work. For years he served on the Committee on Banking and Currency and was on the Committee on Insular Affairs. In his last term he was a member of the Judiciary Committee and had important assignments on the subcommittee having to do with the investigations which have been undertaken by that committee in recent years.

JOE HOOPER was a patriot. He was not only a party man but he was a lover of the American Constitution and of American liberties. He felt, as keenly as any of us can feel, the dangers to American liberties in the trend which the present administration has developed. It was just after making an impassioned appeal for liberty and our Constitution on the floor of the House that he suffered a heart attack and was taken from us. America never needed men of his type and his caliber more than it did at the time he was taken.

He was an outstanding, exceedingly able, and efficient legislator. The people of his State, and the people of the country as a whole will miss him.

Mr. LEHR. Mr. Speaker, in the death of Hon. JOSEPH L. HOOPER this Congress has lost one of its most able and conscientious Members; the Third Congressional District of Michigan has lost its most prominent citizen, and the State of Michigan has been deprived of the services of one of its most loyal servants, and I feel most deeply the loss of a friendship which has been one of my most cherished associations in my service with this Congress.

Many years ago I had become acquainted with JOE HOOPER, then a young lawyer in his home city of Battle Creek, Mich., and that acquaintanceship became renewed during my service in this session of the Congress. On more than one occasion it was my privilege to discuss with Mr. HOOPER matters of legislative moment, and I learned to have the greatest degree of respect for his mental attainments and his knowledge of public affairs and his sincerity of purpose. While he was deeply partisan, he was conscientiously so. His partisanship was not of a blind character that sees nothing good in the principles of the opposition. He was deeply sensible of the responsibilities of his public position, and he entertained a keen sense of his responsibility to his constituents at home.

There was no man in our Michigan delegation for whom I had a more profound respect and admiration than I had for JOE HOOPER. That respect was entertained by me not only because of his ability as a lawyer and a legislator but also because of his honesty and sincerity of purpose. We may differ in matters of policy; but when we differ conscientiously and honestly, then no one can question the propriety of such differences.

JOE HOOPER was a cultured gentleman, a scholar, and a student in all that those terms imply, and above all else, to those of his associates for whom he had a high regard he was the truest kind of friend. Our friendship became very close and very dear in our renewed association in this Congress.

He had planned on not seeking reelection to the next Congress, feeling, in justice to himself, that he should withdraw from public life and take up again the active practice of his profession. And he had looked forward, as I well know, with pleasurable anticipation to the time when he could again be within the bosom of his friends at home, devoting himself to the further enlightenment of his mind and to the rehabilitation of his private fortune. But "man proposes and God disposes", and his ambition to retire from public life and take up again the reins of his private life among his friends at the conclusion of this term of Congress was not to be carried out, in accordance with the will of the Almighty. His death came as a great shock to us who had been so intimately connected with him.

And so as a Democrat, I consider it a privilege to pay this little meed of respect to my Republican colleague. He was a man among men, a loving husband and father, a splendid citizen, and a friend whose memory I shall cherish in my heart as long as time lasts.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, I am indeed grateful for this opportunity to raise my voice in tribute to the memory of my late colleague and fellow Member from Michigan, the Honorable JOSEPH L. HOOPER. Mr. HOOPER was my warm personal friend. It was my privilege to know and work with him in the most cordial of relations since he was first elected to Congress. Mr. HOOPER devoted himself unselfishly to his career of public service, and during his long term in the House of Representatives his stalwart uprightness of character and proven ability won for him the esteem and respect of all with whom he came in contact.

Mr. HOOPER represented the finest type of American citizen, and his early training was of that sort which produces the strong and noble character possessed by him. He was born in Battle Creek, Mich., December 22, 1877. Since early manhood he had been a member of the legal profession. He launched his career of public service as city attorney of Battle Creek, later accepting the position of prosecuting attorney of Calhoun County. After serving with distinction as prosecuting attorney, his call to serve the public led to his election to the Sixty-ninth Congress, where he served brilliantly and with distinction until his unfortunate demise in the early part of this session.

His sudden death came as a great shock to his colleagues in the House of Representatives and to his host of friends throughout the State and the Nation. His outstanding achievements and his lovable personality will cause his name to be long remembered in the State and Nation for whose advancement he devoted his life.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, in these parlous times, when the fate of a nation and the future of a people, shrouded in the still impenetrable mysteries confronting a troubled world, there was perhaps no Member of the House of Representatives whom the country could more ill afford to lose than the Honorable JOSEPH L. HOOPER, of Battle Creek, in the Third Congressional District of Michigan.

Representative HOOPER was one of the high types of legislator with a fine philosophy and sincere desire to do his duty according to his conscience and ability, coupled with indefatigable energy, which made him wellnigh irreplaceable as a servant and a representative of his people in this body.

Not only did his work on the Banking and Currency and Insular Affairs Committees of the House of Representatives reflect these high ideals, that fundamental philosophy and integrity of purpose which characterized Representative HOOPER's life and acts, but his sincerity and energy in studying and analyzing the fundamentals of the problems which confronted his country and his people, in seeking to find solutions and remedies therefor, made his influence felt far beyond the range of the immediate activities to which he had been attending as a minority Member of this body.

As a man and a friend, he was as sincere and loyal as he was in his legislative capacity, and he came to the hour of his passing under conditions afforded few men in this life. If JOSEPH L. HOOPER could have arranged the way of his departure from this earthly scene, undoubtedly he would have preferred to have it come as it did, in the midst of his labors for his country and his people, and in the midst of his activities in the Capitol.

The circumstances of Representative HOOPER's passing are perhaps too well known to require recitation here. Suffice it to say that apparently in 1 hour he was in the full glow of health and in the optimistic spirit which always characterized him in his dealings with his fellow man; and in another hour, while in his office alone at his labors, he had come to the great adventure and had passed beyond the mortal phase.

It is a source of great consolation to his friends to know that his passing was without pain, apparently, and without struggle; a simple laying down of his earthly tasks and a taking on, perhaps, of new duties in another phase.

At all events, his was a joyous life, because he was conscious of giving the best of which he was capable to the service of his people and his country. His faith in his Nation and his Government was profound. His untiring energy and sound philosophy made life for him a period of achievement in the service of others. When the moment of departure came, he was still in the midst of his activities in this service to his people; and he must have passed on with a deep sense of having done his best while among men and with eager anticipation of whatever might lie beyond the portals of death.

More than this, no man may ask. And this much to few men is vouchsafed.

Mr. MUSSELWHITE. Mr. Speaker—

> Sunset and evening star,
> And one clear call for me!
> And may there be no moaning of the bar,
> When I put out to sea.

There is no partisanship in death. The Grim Reaper, inexorable, relentless, mows down without discrimination the most useful plants in the garden of humankind.

And so, in the full flower of his usefulness, JOSEPH LAWRENCE HOOPER was taken from us. Member of Congress for the past 8 years, he was stricken in his office on February 22, Washington's Birthday, after having delivered a scholarly and stirring address on the floor of the House.

JOE HOOPER devoted the last 8 years of his life to a high public service. He was honest, he was honorable, and he was conscientious. And more than that, he was a true friend, a consoler in grief, and a wise counselor in trouble. As a new Member of Congress, and of the opposite political faith, I confided in Mr. HOOPER, and I acknowledge my indebtedness to him for his sympathetic understanding and friendly advice.

Friend and comrade, JOE HOOPER has been taken from us. I would feel remiss in my obligation of friendship if I did not in these few simple words commemorate his passing.

It is one of the inexplicable twists of destiny that the useful should be taken, while so many of the unfit live on, and on, and on. But we cannot quarrel with destiny. The tragic fact persists; JOE HOOPER is gone.

Everyone who knew him is better for having known him. The world is better from his having lived in it. His memory we cherish. It is imperishable.

To those nearest and dearest to him we extend our heartfelt sympathy. Words are futile things. But on his tombstone might well be graven, in all sincerity, these words: "Down this way a gentleman, a patriot, and a statesman has gone."

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the tribute in the House to the memory of Hon. JOSEPH L. HOOPER by colleagues on both sides of the aisle on the morning after his sudden and untimely death emphasized clearly the place which he had won in the minds and hearts of his associates.

He had served his State and Nation with ability and distinction during five successive terms of Congress.

He had proved himself to be a good lawyer, a good debater, a good parliamentarian, and a good presiding officer.

He had demonstrated sanity and courage. He had shown unfailing consideration for the views of others.

No one who knew him well could fail to sense his sincerity or his devotion to principle in the service of his country.

Quick to accord credit to others, he would probably have been surprised at the extent of his influence in the House. We shall miss him.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, JOSEPH LAWRENCE HOOPER was born in Cleveland, Ohio, December 22, 1877, the son of Dr. Joseph R. and Florence R. Hooper. At the age of 5 he moved with his parents to Wellsville, Columbia County, Ohio, and at the age of 13 to Battle Creek, Mich., where he lived continuously until his death.

He acquired his education in the public schools of Battle Creek, graduating from the high school in 1896. Afterward he took a course in stenography in the Battle Creek Business College and then entered the law office of Williams & Lockton as a stenographer. While acting as stenographer he studied law and, after 3 years' study, successfully passed the bar examination and was admitted to practice at the Michigan bar in 1899, at the early age of 21. In November 1900 he was elected circuit court commissioner of Calhoun County, and in November 1902 prosecuting attorney. He served as prosecuting attorney 4 years, from January 1, 1903, to December 31, 1906, making an enviable record for himself and acquiring a State-wide reputation as the brilliant boy prosecutor of the State. During the war he served two terms as city attorney of Battle Creek and was elected to Congress August 18, 1925, at a special election, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Hon. Arthur B. Williams. He served as a Member of this body continuously from that date until his death, February 22, 1934.

Mr. HOOPER was self-educated. He frequently expressed regret that he had not had the benefit of a college training, yet he was one of the best educated of men. He was an omnivorous reader and had a marvelous ability to assimilate and memorize what he read. He was familiar with several languages, and there seemed to be scarcely any limit to his ability to quote from the classics and other literature. As stated in one of the newspapers at the time of his death:

> To friends it was a never-failing source of astonishment that Mr. HOOPER could quote in full almost any poem they might mention. Given the first line he would finish up the poem, and it might be that Mr. HOOPER had not seen or thought about the poem for years. His associates relate that they have seen him on numberless occasions read a long poem through once, close the book, and recite from memory without an error the full text.
> In high school he studied Greek, but after leaving school he acquired of his own study a good knowledge of Spanish and French. On a congressional junket to the West Indies he accompanied the mayor of a town to the high school and gave a talk in Spanish to the pupils. He could recite Cicero in Latin and turn from that to a poem in French. His mastery of the latter language was such that he often held lengthy visits with Mme. Albertine Bernard, high-school French instructor, in the tongue.

One of his early ambitions was to be a writer and author, and his friends have no doubt but that he would have made a marked success in that field if he had devoted himself to it. He often expressed himself in poetry. Upon his death his friends recalled a poem written by him upon the occasion of the removal of an old and respected friend and prominent citizen of Battle Creek to the city of New York as best expressing the sentiment which they felt toward him:

IN FRIENDLY HEARTS YOU HAVE BUILT IT

Giant, you are kindness,
As giant in heart, in thew;
You have builded a loftier castle
Than the olden giants knew;
In friendly hearts you have built it,
All solid and strong and high—
The hearts of your friends who bid you,
O kindly giant, good-bye.

At another time, at a dinner given on the eightieth birthday anniversary of one of his friends, he expressed himself in poem as follows:

TO CHARLES AUSTIN

O good gray friend, we do not come to greet you,
As one bowed down by weight of fourscore years;
As young men to the young we come to meet you,
A peer among your peers.

Those 80 years are naught but 80 pages,
Read in a book whose tale is yet untold;
Your soul is youthful, though the body ages,
And you have not grown old.

You, who have parted with youth's callow blindness,
The care-free heart, the careless-speaking tongue;
You who have grown in sympathy and kindness,
You are not old, but young.

You who are looked upon with glances grateful,
By men whom you have helped to act as men;
You who have learned that wrong is ever hateful,
And right prevails again.

You are young as we, your friends who know and love you,
For all we deem the worthiest and best;
And though the branches of the trees above you
No longer shade the west,

We hold you young in heart and strong in duty,
We know your years of manliness and truth;
We know your life's full need of love and beauty—
This is not age but youth.

Having chosen the law as his profession, he devoted himself assiduously to it and was at the time of his election to Congress one of the leading lawyers in his section of the State and was especially effective and successful as a trial lawyer. As is well known by his colleagues here, he had announced his intention to retire from Congress at the expiration of the term for which he had been elected, for the purpose of returning to the practice of the law which he loved so well. During his service in the House he did what few lawyers here do. He kept up with the current decisions of the courts in anticipation of his eventually returning to the law.

He was an orator of the first mark. During his service in Congress he was perhaps called upon more frequently than any other Member to campaign in other States and make public addresses on important occasions in different parts of the country, and he gave his services in this respect willingly and ungrudgingly.

The death of no Member of the House in recent years, perhaps, caused so much sincere regret and mourning as that of Mr. HOOPER. He occupied a unique position in the hearts and affections of his colleagues on both sides of the aisle, and his death came as a distinct shock to them. As for the people of his district, a friend of broad experience and observation wrote me after his funeral:

I think I have never seen in this section such genuine and universal sorrow in the passing of a public man.

The services in his home city were conducted by the Reverend Carleton Brooks Miller, minister of the First Congregational Church of Battle Creek. He preached a beautiful sermon, brief extracts from which I quote as follows:

There are three things concerning the life of JOSEPH L. HOOPER that I would pick out to mention today: His patriotism, his public speaking, and his friendships.

Joseph was a stanch patriot.

* * * * * * *

How we liked to hear him speak. Words came from him so easily and fluently. His was a vibrant voice set in a luminous, radiant personality. His mind was well furnished to give hospitality to his ideas. Joseph was a great reader. To spend an evening in his presence was to spend much of the time talking about books, particularly biography. But he had read most of the classical English literature as well as the Victorian and early American poets. Gifted with a marvelous memory, he could quote almost endlessly as need arose. His illustrations were apt and striking. He always had an audience in his eye. By absorbing the language and assimilating the thoughts of his reading, he would transmute them by the flame of his own passion, and, as he reached the climax of his speech, dramatically carried his listeners with him. It is said that God gives every man his chance at life. When we remember that JOSEPH HOOPER was self-educated, we can see from what he was and what he accomplished that he made so very much of his chance.

* * * * * * *

But the larger part in the nature of our friend was his kindly, smiling friendship.

Joseph was a carrier of friendliness. Men caught friendship from his very presence.

He died in full possession of his powers. Apparently in his usual good health, he took part in the debate of the session of the House late in the afternoon of the last day of his life, and a few minutes after adjournment was stricken and died alone in his office.

He was an able, conscientious, active, and influential Member of this body; a patriotic and loyal American, devoted to his family and friends, true to every trust imposed upon him, and a man of the highest character and integrity. His place will be hard to fill in the hearts and affections of his friends and in the councils of his State and Nation.

EDWARD WILLIAM POU

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following tribute to the late EDWARD W. POU by Senator ROBERT R. REYNOLDS, of North Carolina:

EDWARD W. POU belonged to that constellation of great men who have shone so brightly in public life. For 17 consecutive terms he was elected and reelected as a Member of the House of Representatives. At the time of his death he was its dean from the standpoint of continuous service.

Unfortunately for me, my associations with him in an official capacity were limited to less than a single term. But all my observation of him, and his whole manner toward me, went to confirm the reputation of his outstanding character, and qualities of head and heart. It would be difficult to figure the ideal of a statesman more complete than he was in reality—plain, solid, wise as a counsellor, ripe in political knowledge, courteous, and benevolent.

His whole manner was reflected in his deportment. Urbane in his manners, amiable in temper, scrupulously impartial, attentive to duty, perfect in his knowledge of the rules, and firm in his purpose, he won the affection and support of his colleagues not by the authority of the high office he held as Chairman of the powerful Rules Committee but rather by the graces of his deportment and his eminent qualifications as a man.

Although politically he was classed as a Democrat, he was as much a favorite on one side of the House as on the other. This was true even in time of war when party spirit was intense.

The career of ED. POU, extending over a period of nearly half a century, will forever be an inspiration to those who knew him. He seemed born for his station.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I prize this privilege of paying tribute to one for whom I held so much admiration and genuine affection. Few men have been blessed with such power to make friends and hold them throughout a lifetime as that possessed by the late EDWARD W. POU. The ties with which he bound men to him were like "hoops of steel." Such power is not possible in one who lacks that sincerity and ability which characterized his whole life. Few men lived for their friends as he did, and no man possessed a higher degree of patriotism and love for public service.

In his 30 years of service in the House of Representatives, men may have differed with him, but no one has ever questioned his superb integrity in all things, both great and small. In his official life, a rare moral and political courage, together with his broad grasp of public affairs, made him essentially one of the outstanding statesmen in his day and generation. The name of EDWARD W. POU will go down in the history of North Carolina along with Vance, the revered war governor; Aycock, the great educator; Macon; and others who have added luster to the brilliant records of the Old North State.

His life was an inspiration to those of us who were privileged to serve with him in the Halls of Congress, as well as to those who will come after him. His lofty ideals and love for the fundamental institutions of the American Government stimulated in others a desire to emulate his public service.

In times like these this Nation can ill afford to lose men of his type. The removal of his keen eye and his steady hand, which have been so powerful and effective in the guidance of the Nation, is an irreparable loss.

The people of Alabama, his native State, in whose soil his forbears sleep, share with North Carolina, his adopted State, not only that pride which all North Carolinians have in his exemplary record but their great grief in the passing of a beloved national figure.

EDWARD W. POU will be remembered as "a gentleman unafraid, who never betrayed a trust and who never weakened on a friend."

His passing is a personal loss to me. The memory of his loyal friendship is to me a priceless treasure.

> His life was gentle, and the elements
> So mixed in him, that nature might stand up,
> And say to all the world, This was a man!

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, the death of Hon. EDWARD W. POU, Representative from the Fourth District of North Carolina, on April 1, 1934, brought sadness to all those who knew him.

It was not my privilege to know Mr. POU until after I was elected a Member of Congress. When I came to Washington, Mr. POU, as dean of the North Carolina delegation, extended to me every possible kindness and courtesy, and from then until the time of his death I saw him frequently, and every contact with him increased my affectionate regard for him personally and officially.

Mr. POU was richly endowed with the beautiful qualities of gentleness, kindness, and generosity. He was one of the most unselfish men I have ever known in public life. His ability, strength of character, courage, loyalty, and long tenure of service gave him a unique place in the House of Representatives. During the specal session of the Seventy-third Congress, although ill physically, Mr. POU, as Chairman of the Rules Committee of the House, did as much, I think, as any other one man in America to enact into law the program of President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

As a new Member, I was impressed by his frankness, his courage, and his loyalty. I was also impressed by his faithfulness to the duties of his office and his desire to serve the people of his district, State, and Nation. He was to me, during the time I knew him, an inspiration and a fine example of a patriotic statesman. When he answered the last roll call, his congressional district, his State, and his Nation suffered a distinct loss, and his life of public service will continue to be a source of encouragement to all those who knew him.

Mr. CLARK of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, though I had known him by reputation for years, as he was so well and favorably known to all the people of his State, it was not my privilege to know Hon. EDWARD W. POU personally until I attended my first session of Congress in 1929. He was at that time dean of the North Carolina delegation and had long occupied a high position of leadership in Congress.

The coming of a new Member of Congress, even in his own delegation, was certainly no new experience for Mr. POU. During his long and honorable service he had seen countless Members come and go. Yet when I met him, he was so exceedingly courteous to me and treated me with so much fine consideration as to make me feel that my presence in the delegation really amounted to something. He won my heart from the very beginning, and my admiration of him increased with the passing years. I soon learned that the fine manner in which he treated me, his beautiful courtesy, and his uniform consideration were but the natural expression of a splendid and lovable personality. These characteristics, so pronounced in him, must account in large measure for his unusual popularity and the high esteem in which he was held by his colleagues of every political faith. He was indeed a gentleman of the old school, and few men have held a higher place in the esteem of their fellow men.

As a legislator Mr. POU's career was unique and remarkable. He possessed a fine and accurate knowledge of public questions. His mental processes were logical. His presentation of a question was brief, clear, pointed, and forceful. He was fearless and courageous. He never hesitated to take a position upon any question, and having done so, it was boldly asserted and plausibly maintained. His career set a high mark to be aimed at by those of us who are still permitted to labor in the field that he loved so well. As Chairman of the Rules Committee in the national crisis incident to the World War and again in the same position during the crisis through which the Nation is now passing, he rendered a distinct and very fine service to the country that he loved so passionately and made for himself a permanent place among distinguished North Carolinians.

I count it a high privilege to have known and worked with him for a brief spell.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, loving him while he lived and treasuring his memory now that he is gone, I pause to pay tribute to my close personal friend, EDWARD W. POU, of North Carolina. Shortly after I entered the Congress, there grew up a relationship between us almost like that of father and son, and many times I sought his wise counsel and advice and his broad sympathetic interest. He was a man without guile—completely free from hypocrisy, political or otherwise, and he lived out his life with the high ideals that actuated his every course. Privileged to serve his State and Nation almost longer than any other man in the history of the House of Representatives, he charted his path as a statesman and legislator along national lines that made an indelible impress in the far-reaching legislation of his day.

He was one of the fairest and most honorable men I have ever known. He looked with contempt upon those who would take short cuts. He was slow to promise, but once his word was given it was his bond. In committee and in debate, he only desired to assure himself that a matter was right, and then he became a powerful advocate with the zeal of a crusader. He was as gentle as a child. He could never hate, and men were tied to him with hooks of steel.

Twice chairman of the great Committee on Rules, he was the trusted counselor and the strong legislative arm of Woodrow Wilson and Franklin D. Roosevelt in two of the greatest and most interesting periods in the life of the Nation. They leaned heavily on him, for they knew that he was devoid of selfishness and that patriotism was his guide star.

It is not given to many to receive the confidence and trust and public acclaim as did Mr. POU. One could not have reached his commanding position either by accident or seniority. He was one of that brilliant coterie of young men whom Simmons and Aycock gathered about them and made their lieutenants in a trying era in North Carolina, and he had won the gratitude of the people and showed his mettle even before he entered Congress. From then up to the time of his passing his name was a synonym in our State for character, force, integrity, and ability.

The Congress was richer by reason of his distinguished and enviable service, and he will not be forgotten here at the scene of his many triumphs where his personality and beauty of soul was all-pervading.

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege of knowing EDWARD W. POU only in his latter years when he was in the second half of life "for which the first was made." I shall not trace his lineage or development; I cannot explain all the factors, all the vicissitudes of fortune which molded his career. But I do wish to offer my tribute of respect to the maturity of his intellect and character.

On the floor of the House, as Chairman of the Rules Committee, or in whatever responsibility devolved upon him, Mr. POU was steadfast and direct. In the midst of the conflict, when doubt and uncertainty confused other minds, he was unperplexed. His spirit seemed imbued with a profound calm.

With all his firmness, Mr. POU possessed rare tact. I think that he was permeated by a certain innate gentleness which is not often found in men of public life. Regardless of party affiliations, Members of Congress loved and respected him. He was the incarnation of candor and kindliness. As one of his younger colleagues, I can testify to his unfailing thoughtfulness and consideration.

But the crowning glory of Mr. POU's personality was his love for humanity, his sympathy with the unfortunate and the afflicted. In the words of his chosen epitaph, he was "never mean enough to despise a man because he was poor, because he was ignorant, or because he was black."

He represented his district ably; he labored for his State and Nation through two periods of greatest stress and strain; he served humanity. And now that he has passed Beyond, he "leaves a lonesome place against the sky."

I insert as a part of my remarks a brief eulogy written by Joseph P. Tumulty, former secretary to President Wilson:

In the death of EDWARD W. POU, a congressional landmark has passed. Here was a life wholly and unselfishly given to public service. Never dramatic nor demagogic, with quietude and serenity he wended his modest way, drawing men to his side in bonds of the warmest affection, scorning the smooth velvet path of expediency, never surrendering to the illusions of the present day, always seeing straight and true in a perplexed and distracted age.

Fortunately, in these days when scandals in public life screech from the headlines, it was a comforting and consoling fact to have living in our very midst this knightly figure of the South, who, having about him the grandeur of the old-fashioned, lived and labored for his country and his people. As an associate of Woodrow Wilson during the critical days of the war, I can testify to the loyal way he stood by the side of the President, never flinching, always moving forward, as one of the principal congressional aids of his Commander in Chief. The death of EDWARD POU brings a pang of sorrow to everyone who knew and loved him.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, it is with a sense of profound respect that I endeavor to briefly express my feelings over the loss of our esteemed colleague, the Honorable EDWARD WILLIAM POU.

His passing is a distinct loss to the House of Representatives in which he served and gave his wise counsel for the past 33 years, and to me the loss of one of the most lovable characters I have ever been privileged to call "my friend."

Mr. POU was educated at the University of North Carolina. He served with distinction as solicitor of the fourth judicial district of North Carolina, to which position he was first elected in 1890, and reelected in 1894 and 1898. While serving in his third term as solicitor, he was chosen by the people of his district as their Representative and spokesman in the Congress of the United States.

His unselfish devotion and tireless work in Congress endeared him more and more to the people of his district, who at the last election gave him the largest majority of his long and notable career.

No Member of the House enjoyed the respect and confidence of his colleagues more than did ED POU. Intellectually honest, always candid, sincere, and straightforward, he abhorred hypocrisy in all its forms. Throughout his long, eventful, and distinguished public career he followed the path of duty outlined clearly and unmistakably by a conscience that was responsive always to the noblest impulses of true manhood. That was his crowning characteristic.

During the administration of Woodrow Wilson he served his country with marked distinction as Chairman of the powerful Rules Committee of this House and was again serving in that capacity at the time of his death.

His life was characterized always by intense patriotism and devotion to duty. His love for his country was surpassed by no man. His career has been notable. His life work has been worth while. His ability and fidelity were unsurpassed. His years have been full of work and deeds well done.

In his death all of us who were so closely associated with him experience a strong sense of personal loss. We shall all miss him, not only now but in the future. He was a man we all loved, because he had the qualities of mind and heart which endeared him to those who knew him. He has finished his work, he has gone to his reward, but we are happier because we knew him, and the world is better for his example.

ANTILYNCHING BILL

Mr. WAGNER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and to lie on the table an open letter addressed to the Congress of the United States by The Writers' League Against Lynching.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WRITERS' LEAGUE AGAINST LYNCHING,
New York City, April 24, 1934.

An Open Letter to the Congress of the United States:

The Costigan-Wagner antilynching bill is now before you for consideration in the Senate, and the Ford bill, which is identical, is before the House of Representatives.

We, the undersigned writers, publicists, and editors of the United States, take this means of urging immediate passage of this legislation, which has been declared constitutional by Charles H. Tuttle, former United States attorney for the southern district of New York, and other eminent lawyers whose opinions are a part of the official record.

For too long has America been held up to shame and ridicule throughout the world because of the unrestrained activities of lawless mobs which have lynched and even burned human beings at the stake. Among the victims have been not only men but women and even children. Five thousand and fifty-three lynchings have disgraced our country since 1882; 1,438 of these victims have been white and 94 of them have been women.

The argument that the majority of lynchings are in punishment of rape has long since been exploded by impartial examination of the facts, which reveals that less than one sixth of these victims have even been accused of sex offenses. No part of our country has been immune to this crime and the evil is spreading with alarming rapidity. State governments have clearly and unmistakably manifested their unwillingness or their inability to prevent lynchings or punish lynchers. A solemn obligation, therefore, rests upon the Federal Government speedily to enact this legislation into law.

SCHOOL SAFETY MOVEMENT—ADDRESS BY SENATOR REYNOLDS

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech broadcast from radio station WJSV on Thursday, April 26, by the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] on the subject of the school-safety movement. That Senator is one of the vice presidents of the American Automobile Association and is actively interested in the promotion of all safety measures. No one, I believe, has exhibited a greater interest in the movement looking to the safety of school children in particular, and pedestrians and automobilists in general, than has the alert and able junior Senator from North Carolina.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My friends of the air, one of the great things that has come out of our social movements of the last 25 years is the discovery that the child is not merely a small-sized adult, but is a growing, developing, and ever-changing individual. We have also discovered that the manner in which we train the child is a forecast of social change. We realize more than ever before that in the status and training of the child we reflect the knowledge, the hopes, and the values of a people which they are building into the future society.

There are many reasons why this new appreciation of the child is most significant. Approximately one fifth of the entire population of our country is represented in the age group between 5 and 9 years. These 25,000,000 boys and girls, the greater number of whom are in our elementary schools, are now being trained for future citizenship.

These youngsters are at a crucial period in their lives. They are being prepared to carry on our existing social order and to preserve our institutions. They are also being equipped to build anew if we fail to give them the heritage they deserve. The whole future of our country is in their hands.

It is our solemn duty to evidence the proper interest in their welfare, to provide them with adequate institutions for training, and to teach them the obligations of citizenship.

That we, as a people, are alive to the responsibility is evidenced on every hand. We have built magnificent school buildings in our cities. We have replaced the one-room school in the country with a modern, consolidated school, and we provide busses for the transportation of children residing some distance from these schools. We have utilized the radio, the motion picture, and other modern inventions in conjunction with the teaching of the three "R's." In addition, there are buildings and clubs to which our youngsters can turn in off-school hours for not only constructive training, but for amusement and recreation.

The rise of organizations for youth, especially since the war, its part of the movement to provide direction and guidance to boys and girls. It is my desire, during my brief talk to you tonight, to review one of these organizations. Its primary objective represents the very highest ideal, the protection of our school children from accidents in this day when the heavy flow of traffic confuses even adults. I refer to the school safety patrols, sponsored by the American Automobile Association, of which I have the honor of being a vice president.

Enlisted in these patrols in 1,800 cities and towns in every section of the country are some 250,000 boys and girls. In the National Capital alone there are more than 3,000. Each morning of the school year these youngsters, identified by their white "Sam Browne" belts and glistening badges, take their posts of duty on the street corners in the vicinity of schools. They have no police powers and are instructed not to attempt to direct vehicular traffic. Their duty is to simply hold impetuous children on the sidewalks until the street is clear of traffic.

In Washington, as in many other cities, police departments have designated officers not only to work in conjunction with the patrol members but to train them. This new spirit of cooperation between the officers of the law and our boys is in itself conducive to good citizenship. And I wish to commend municipal authorities for their interest in the patrol movement as demonstrated by the assignment of 16 of our finest officers to duty with the school patrols.

As a result of the splendid training offered, it is not unusual to find youngsters 8 and 9 years old warning their parents of the proper way to cross streets and urging them not to "jaywalk" in the middle of the block. Thus we find our children educating their elders on the rules for self-protection.

I am confident that our honored President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, echoed the thoughts of millions when, referring to the school patrols, he said:

"In addition to the day-to-day protection against accidents to school children afforded by the patrols, the movement is unquestionably a fine builder of morale. It also develops a sense of responsibility which cannot but make for good citizenship.

"It is my sincere hope that it will continue to expand and remain as a permanent feature of our national effort in the interest of traffic safety."

The conditions on our streets and highways today should be a matter of grave concern to every citizen.

Every 17 minutes of the day and night a human life is snuffed out on an artery of travel somewhere in the United States, and no less than 35 people are more or less seriously injured on our streets and highways. This means that in the course of a single year approximately 30,000 people are killed in motor accidents and more than a million are injured, some of them maimed for life.

In this connection it is interesting to note that largely due to the school patrols and safety education in the schools the number of motor fatalities involving children of tender years has steadily decreased, while those involving adults have increased tremendously. For example, in the 10-year period, 1922 to 1931, all motor fatalities increased 96 percent; those involving persons between 15 and 19 years of age increased 165 percent; those involving persons of ages between 20 and 24 increased 185 percent; but those involving children between 5 and 9 years of age actually decreased 10 percent. Here indeed is evidence of the value of training the child in highway safety.

What this means to the future cannot be overestimated. It means that the school children today, who will be the motor-vehicle operators of tomorrow, will sit behind the wheel with a background of training in self-protection. In this, as much as in anything else, lies the hope for an ultimate solution of our accident problem.

There is no better way in which the people in Washington and elsewhere can help this great safety movement more than by giving their support to its sponsors, cooperating with the patrol members by driving carefully in the vicinity of schools and by neglecting no opportunity to encourage the patrol members.

On Saturday morning all Washington and the thousands of visitors in our midst will pay a tribute to the humanitarian service rendered by the patrol boys and girls here in Washington. The occasion will be a safety parade in which some 4,000 youngsters will participate. In addition to 3,000 from the District of Columbia, there will be approximately 1,000 from Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina. I am proud that my State is to be represented. I appreciate the manner in which public-spirited citizens have made it possible for these boys and girls to come to Washington. I shall look forward to greeting them and spending as much time with them as is possible.

The parade, so I am informed, will move promptly at 10:30 up Pennsylvania Avenue to Fifteenth Street, south on Fifteenth and west on Constitution Avenue past the reviewing stand. It is my hope that many of my colleagues in the Senate and the House will find time to review this parade and lend their encouragement to the boys and girls participating. And I urge every citizen who can possibly do so to be present and applaud the marchers for real service in line of duty.

THE "BRAIN TRUST"—ADDRESS BY H. L. MENCKEN

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address broadcast yesterday by Mr. H. L. Mencken, as published in the Baltimore Sun of April 28.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun of Apr. 28, 1934]

MENCKEN WARNS "BRAIN TRUST" COUNTRY MAY RISE AGAINST IT—IN FABLE OF TOO MANY DOCTORS, HE TELLS PROFESSORS IN NATION-WIDE BROADCAST THEY HAVE WORN OUT WELCOME WITH COSTLY "NEW SURE CURE EVERY DAY"

Professors in Washington "with a new sure cure every day" are wearing out their welcome and had better be gone in peace before the country rises against them, H. L. Mencken told an audience in a Nation-wide broadcast last night.

Mr. Mencken spoke for 15 minutes from Baltimore on "What Is Ahead." He couched his talk in what he called "a little fable" and concluded with a warning to the "brain trust" to "go back to teaching sophomores how to be ashamed of their fathers."

BEGINS HIS "FABLE"

"There was a man who began to feel seedy and out of sorts", Mr. Mencken began his fable. "He had dreams at night, and every morning there was a 'dark-brown' taste in his mouth. So he sent for his family doctor and asked for some medicine. The doctor felt his pulse and looked at his tongue but refused to give him any.

"'Medicine', he said, 'wouldn't do you any good. All you need is to change your way of living. You work too hard and play too hard. You eat too much and drink too much. You have been on a continuous bust for 3 or 4 years, and it's no wonder you feel rocky. Cut out your boozing and your 36-hole golf, eat lightly, and go to bed early, and you'll be all right.'

"But that seemed almost worse than being sick, so the man sent for another doctor. This one, to his surprise, said pretty much the same thing. The only difference was that doctor no. 2 told him to cut out meat and to stop reading the newspapers.

"The man tried this prescription for a day or two, but it was such hard going that he began to cheat; and when the end of the first week came, and he felt just as badly, he sent for a third doctor. This third one advised exactly what the first one had advised, and the man began to suspect that there must be something serious the matter with him, and that the doctors were in cahoots to conceal it from him.

"So he was ready to listen to a friend who recommended a new kind of doctor—what the friend called an osteopath. This osteopath, it appeared, didn't give any medicine; he cured everything by rubbing. The man went to see him, was rubbed all over, paid a stiff bill—and came home still feeling woozy.

"The next day another friend came in and said that the right man to see was a chiropractor. The osteopaths, he said, were too mild and polite; a chiropractor went at it hammer and tongs and pulled a disease out by the roots. So the man went to one of them and was rolled and pummeled until he yelled for mercy. But though the treatment was undoubtedly thorough and the bill was certainly no midget, the man kept on feeling badly.

EVEN STRANGERS ADVISE

"By this time the news got about that he was sick, and all sorts of people dropped in to offer advice, some of them complete strangers. One of them said that the thing to do was to see an Indian herb doctor, and another recommended a faith healer. A third said his uncle had been cured of something much worse by a madstone, and a fourth said that he had been saved from death himself by some kind of laying on of hands.

"There were 80 or 90 others, and each knew of a new kind of doctor who was sure fire. Some of these doctors seemed to be weird fellows, but they were all highly recommended, they were all full of confidence in themselves and they all sent in stiff bills, so the sick man kept on, for he figured that if even 99 percent of them failed, he still stood a good chance of being cured by the hundredth.

TRIES MASS TREATMENT

"But going to see them one by one began to seem a waste of time, and the thought occurred to him that it might be a good idea to see two a day. He tried it and found that they used up only 2 hours between them, so he tried three a day, and then a dozen. And then, thinking that he might as well make a clean sweep of it, he cleared all the furniture out of his house, took up the carpets, notified the whole gang to send down their tools and gave over his entire time to being cured.

"Every morning he got up at dawn and devoted the whole day to the business. Sometimes there were 40 of those wizards in the house at once, fighting for room to rub him, sweat him, freeze him, dose him, pump him out, knock him down, yank him up, and pray over him.

FRIENDS TAKE HAND

"It sounded like it ought to work, but somehow it didn't. If he made any progress, no one save the wizards could see it. They all told him that he was getting well, but everyone said that he would get well quicker if he chased out all the others, and his friends couldn't see that he was getting well at all. Worse, this wholesale treatment ran into a tremendous amount of money. The man spent all he had, borrowed all he could from his friends, and then fell into the hands of money lenders.

"Finally his friends got together and decided that they would have to do something to save him. Some were for having him locked up as a lunatic, but the wiser heads thought of a simpler way. They hired a couple of stout fellows with handy fists, went to the house in a body, heaved the professors out of the window, put the sick man to bed, and posted a guard to see that he stayed there. Then they dug up his family doctor's original prescription and made him follow it.

RETURNS TO NORMALCY

"The man protested for a while, but presently he talked himself to sleep, and thereafter he snored peacefully for 12 hours. It was the first decent rest he had had for months. He awoke feeling much better, and next day he sat up in a chair. In a week he was out taking the sun, and in 2 weeks he was back to normalcy.

"His weight increased, he had a good appetite, he slept well, and he was eager to return to business. The family doctor, who had been called back to boss the job, allowed him a few glasses of beer a day—but no more. Nine holes of golf—but no more. A beefsteak once a week—but no more. Now he is well again.

"This little story has a moral. We are all well acquainted with a fine old fellow who greatly resembles the man I have been telling you about. He lives in Washington, and we call him Uncle Sam. A year or two ago he began to feel very wobbly. He had horrible dreams at night and a "dark-brown" taste in the morning. The regular doctors down at Washington told him that he was living too fast and advised him to slow down a bit. But he didn't like the prescription, and refused to follow it.

ALSO IS GOING BROKE

"Instead, he began to send for all sorts of amateur healers, each of whom allowed that he alone could cure him, and that all the regular doctors were quacks. In a little while his house was full of these healers—and they are there yet. They are dosing him day and night, and with an endless variety of powders and pills. No two of them agree, save on one thing only: they all send in tremendous bills. The poor old man, poisoned by their doses, is not only making heavy weather of it, with many set-backs; he is also going broke.

"And when I say that Uncle Sam is going broke, it is the same as saying, of course, that the American taxpayer is going broke. He hasn't got the full smash of it yet, but pretty soon he will feel it. Every nickel that the professors at Washington are throwing away will have to come out of his pocket. There is no other way to get it.

Either it must come out in hard cash, or it must be melted out by inflation. If any of you think you can escape your share of the bill, then you are fooling yourselves badly. Either directly or indirectly we shall all have to pay up. Even if you are getting some of the gravy today, you will have to pay for it with interest when the bills come in. And the poorer you are the more, relative to your income, will you have to pay.

Has all this waste of money done us any good? I doubt it. We have moved toward recovery, not because of it but in spite of it. The English, who were much worse off than we were 2 years ago, have gone much farther along the road than we have. They have a surplus in their treasury and are even reducing taxes. Yet they have done this without putting a single bright young college professor on their pay roll or laying out a cent for economic madstones and bile-beans.

SENDING THEM TO UNITED STATES

Instead, they have begun to export their own wizards to America, and some of them are in Washington at this minute trying to interest poor Uncle Sam in their goods.

I began with a fable and I end with what the pastors call a message, spelling it with a capital M. This message is not addressed to the taxpayer; he has begun to fret and stir already, and in a little while he will be blowing steam out of every pore. I address it instead to the brethren of the "brain trust", some of whom I admire for their enterprise, though I do not like their medicines. You are wearing out your welcome, gents, and had better be gone in peace before the country rises against you.

Go back to your old job while the going is still good. Go back to teaching sophomores to be ashamed of their fathers. If you go on much longer trying a new sure cure on poor old Uncle Sam every day and sending in a bill for $100,000,000 with every one, you may wake up some morning and find the country howling for your hide. And when that time comes, you may discover that both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue have slid from under you and you are left to face the music alone.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION—HOUSE BILL REFERRED

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the House has transmitted to the Senate the bill (H.R. 7059) to provide for the further development of vocational education in the several States and Territories. I wish to make a brief statement in that connection.

A bill was introduced in the Senate on January 10, 1934, by myself, numbered S. 2119. That bill was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, because all agricultural vocational education legislation has come out of that particular committee. Subsequently, on the 18th of January, the same bill was introduced in the House by Representative ELLZEY of Mississippi and others. In the House the House bill was referred to the Committee on Education.

I ask unanimous consent that House bill No. 7059, which has passed the House, be laid before the Senate and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill coming over from the House of Representatives, which will be read by title.

The bill (H.R. 7059) to provide for the further development of vocational education in the several States and Territories, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

SALARIES OF RURAL LETTER CARRIERS—HOUSE BILL REFERRED

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask to have laid before the Senate the bill (H.R. 8919) to adjust the salaries of rural letter carriers, and for other purposes, which has just come over from the House, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill coming over from the House of Representatives, which will be stated by title.

The bill (H.R. 8919) to adjust the salaries of rural letter carriers, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

THE AIR MAIL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3170) to revise air-mail laws.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, in speaking to the pending question under the limitation of debate, I am not inclined to occupy as much time as the limitation would permit. The issue that has been involved in the air-mail controversy has been rather fully covered on both sides.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] in offering his proposed substitute made an appeal that since the deed has been done there is, from his standpoint, only one action left for us to take, and that is to proceed to enact legislation to take the place of that now on the statute books. With what the Senator from Nevada said there is much sympathy among Members of the Senate. It is, however, difficult for me to acquiesce in the suggestion that what was done should be forgotten and we should proceed to build upon the ruins which had been wrought and forget what these ruins once represented.

I do not deny that there might be improvement upon the old law by some amendment or, if thought wise, by entirely new legislation; but I do not see that that is at all necessary. The statement given out by the Post Office Department that "under the new plan there will be a great saving to the Government" is a flimsy attempt to excuse what has been done. If the only accomplishment were to be in the saving of money, it would be totally indefensible, because the money that may be saved under any new contracts could have been saved under the old contracts.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] made an inquiry of the Senator from Nevada as to whether there is any uniformity in the payments for carrying the mails. The Senator from Nevada, I am sure, did not mean to state that the lack of uniformity is due to any requirement of law or inadequacy of law. I have no doubt he meant to state the fact that the lack of uniformity in rates is due to lack of uniformity in conditions. For example, one rate applies to a route over a dangerous terrain. The cost in that case will be different from the cost over a perfectly flat country where there is no such hazard. The cost of carrying the mail over a generally foggy area would also be different from what it would be where such a condition did not exist. However, the whole situation with reference to the different conditions was met in the legislation known as the "McNary-Watres Act."

In order that the public, if they should examine what was said yesterday, may not be misled as to the true meaning of "lack of uniformity", I call attention to the fact that carriage of the mail is let upon a basis of weight unit of pounds carried and also on the basis of space unit or cubic feet occupied. If the weight unit were 200 pounds and the space unit were 12½ cubic feet, the base rate would be 50 cents, but the rate actually paid would not be the same over all routes. It would not be the same over a route that is free from any danger as it would be over a route that covers, for instance, a dangerous terrain. The rate would be higher if the route required night flying than if there were no night flying. The variables upon which the base pay is fixed where the weight unit is 200 pounds would include 15 cents, which would be applicable to night flying; that is, it would be that much more for night flying than if there were no night flying. The other variables would include such items as 2 cents for dangerous terrain, 2 cents for fog, 3 cents for one-way radio, 6 cents for two-way radio. For 2 to 5 passengers it would be 1½ cents, for 6 to 9 passengers 3 cents, for 10 to 19 passengers 4½ cents, 20 to 29 passengers 6 cents, 30 passengers and over 7½ cents. That makes up the 50 cents allocated in accordance with the character of the routes.

In the case of the 1,000-pound unit, a plane having more than one engine is required. That applies to the multi-motor plane. The thousand pounds would occupy 62½ cubic feet of space and there would be an extra charge to the Government of 13 cents therefor. That 13 cents is due to the requirement of a multi-motor plane instead of a single-motor plane.

In the case of a 2,000-pound load, occupying 125 cubic feet of space, there is a maximum 80-cent base rate, including 15 cents for night flying, 2 cents for dangerous terrain, 2 cents for fog, 3 cents for one-way radio, 6 cents for two-way radio, and the passenger rates varying from 1½ cents up to 7½ cents as I have just stated, with a further additional charge of 13 cents because of a larger multi-motored plane being required.

When the statement is made that there is no uniformity of pay for the carrying of the mail, it ought to be understood that the lack of uniformity is due to lack of uniformity of conditions on the routes. Surely there could be no one so foolish as to assert that the same rate of pay should be applicable to a perfectly safe route over level country, and to a route over a very dangerous terrain, through fog, over mountains, or involving night flying.

Suppose the Postmaster General had in his mind only reduction of pay, as would be indicated by the character of speeches which have been made here defending cancelation. Everything the Postmaster General has secured or may secure under the reduction of pay could have been secured under the present law. He could have secured it without any additional legislation. The Postmaster General had that authority in order that he could build up the aviation industry, and still confine it to such a cost level as that ultimately it would be self-supporting.

For example, under the present law the Postmaster General is required to make a rerating or reexamination of the pay every year. As I stated, the last Postmaster General, in reducing the rate of pay, had twice in 1 year changed the rate. Postmaster General Farley could have said to the air-mail carriers: "We are paying $15,000,000 for this service. We do not intend to pay it any longer. We will pay only half that sum. We are not going to pay over $7,500,000, or we are not going to pay over $10,000,000. I am going to make the allocations."

How would he do it? He would take the same formula that is provided under the present law. He would fix the base pay that would be estimated on a total payment of $7,500,000 or $10,000,000.

He would say, "So much of this is night flying. Where now the rate is 15 cents, we are going to cut it to 7½ cents", if the service could be rendered for such an amount, in his judgment, "and for dangerous terrain we will cut the extra allowance one half of 1 cent, or 1½ cents", in accordance with his own judgment as to how it should be cut. The Postmaster General could take these variables, of which there are 12, and reduce them to whatever percentage he cared to, and he could have the mail carried, if the contractor would be willing to go on with it, at any figure he might fix, because that is the power of the Postmaster General, written into the law; and it was written there for the purpose of giving him an opportunity to continue to reduce the cost until he could hope totally to eliminate all elements of subsidy.

So the misconception that may have gotten before the country that there is no possibility of reducing the cost unless we have new legislation must be entirely removed, because there is not a scintilla of basis for that statement.

Mr. President, another statement has been made which I desire to correct. There has been a great deal said in the press, in the committee room, and now on the floor of the Senate with reference to exorbitant profits made by these companies. While I do not believe it is any of our business to prescribe what a corporation shall pay in the way of salaries, while I do not agree with those who say that capital is paid too highly, while I do not agree that a corporation should not be permitted to pay its officiary what it believes is justified—while I think that is none of our business, I do agree with those who insist upon knowing how money is being expended by any corporation which is receiving a subsidy from the Government.

It is perfectly legitimate for the Government, if it is permitting subsidies to be paid, to follow up the expenditure of those subsidies; and there should be no lifting of the ban on what capital should be paid in the form of salaries under those conditions. To that I agree; but what about the statement made on the floor day before yesterday as to the enormous profits these companies make?

The truth about the matter is that the companies have not been profitable; that the facts show that only three of the companies have had any profits. Most of them have been running at a loss; but where do the figures come from that were inserted in the RECORD by a Senator day before yesterday purporting to show the large profits of the companies?

Those figures relate to purchases and sales of the securities of the companies; and the error of the author of the figures is found in his confusion of the profits of a corporation with the profits from buying and selling the securities of the corporation. Nine times out of ten, if not ninety-nine times out of a hundred, the purchases and sales of such securities are totally outside of the corporation or anyone identified with the corporation. Once in a while the corporate body does profit from sales of securities, especially where the company sells its own securities, and then later on buys them back to be sold at a higher price. If a company does that, it may be subject to criticism.

Mr. President, I sat in the office of one of the leaders of business in my State, a man who deals in automobile parts. His industry required an enormous amount of copper. This man took occasion to buy, for his manufacturing purposes, a supply of copper that would run his plant for nearly a year. There was a spurt in the price of copper. It continued to go up; and this great manufacturer had a large supply of copper for which he had paid a low price, far below the price at that day. He said, "I could sell three fourths of this copper and still have a tremendous supply on hand"; and he was convinced that copper had reached a high point, and that it would surely fall in price. I know, for I witnessed it, that an order was given to sell a large amount of the copper this manufacturer had purchased, while still retaining enough to supply his plant for 3 months; and on the sales he made a cash profit of $96,000. That was not speculation. That was dealing in a commodity for actual delivery upon which there was an exorbitant increase of price.

Mr. President, some 5 or 6 years ago the Interstate Commerce Committee was investigating the power issue at a time when stocks were hitting the skies on the stock exchange. I told Mr. Manton Davis, the counsel in chief of the American Radio Corporation, that if it would not be embarrassing to him I should like to have him explain why radio stock had reached a price of over 500. The par value of the stock was 100, and the day I asked him the question it was selling for 500 plus. Mr. Manton Davis, after stating that the question was not embarrasing to him—for I did not want to inject a question that might cause any embarrassment to any firm—said: "There is no embarrassment in the matter except that we do not know the cause of the high range of the sales of radio securities. We have nothing to do with it. The buying and selling is on the stock exchange, which we cannot control, and the high range is more embarrassing to the directorate of this corporation than it is to anyone else."

Then he added, "I assume that the reason why prices are running five times the par value is because radio is an unknown product, and its future is unlimited, and many people believe that the expansion will be sufficiently great that they can afford to pay five times the par value of the stock."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. FESS. I will yield in a moment. The assertion that when a company's securities were thus being speculated in upon the stock exchange, against the interest of the corporation itself, the profit was the profit of the company, is a commentary upon the business sense of any man who makes that statement.

I yield to my friend.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am satisfied that the Senator did not know the implications of one remark he made about sellings these unknown stocks on the stock exchange. We have the National Government always ballyhooing prosperity, and the stock exchange always taking advantage of it, and selling the stock of the companies making the unknown products, many times without any earnings whatever, for a great deal more than the stock would be worth even in its most favorable light, which is another reason why we ought to regulate the stock exchanges a little more.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, there is not any doubt that there ought to be corrections of the operations on the stock exchanges. Just how that is to be done, and whether or not the bill now before us will do it, is of course an open question. My point is that it is astonishing that any one should confuse the profits of a gambler on the stock exchange with the profits of the company whose securities are being sold.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator will pardon me, for instance, if he will remember, during the boom days of 1928, United States Steel—which I think was paying a dividend of 5 or 6 or 7 percent—was being quoted at as high as $300 a share. Manifestly, its earnings did not justify a price of that kind; and there were many stocks like that.

Mr. FESS. The steel corporation was not getting the profits that were being made on the stock exchange.

Mr. LONG. No; the speculation was due to the idea in the public mind that we were in a very prosperous condition; but those who looked at the figures certainly could have realized that a stock paying 6-percent dividends could not be worth $300 a share.

Mr. FESS. That is the difficulty. There is not any doubt that there must be some correction of what is going on in the stock exchange. I have no doubt about that; but why should a responsible individual relate the doings of the stock exchange, the sales and the purchases of securities, and then ascribe those profits to the company? That is what I am saying. Most of the air-mail companies were unprofitable; but it is true that a lot of gamblers made money on the purchases and sales of these very stocks.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, there was in New Orleans a very prosperous bank, and some folks began to run the stock of that bank up. The bank tried its best to keep its stock from being pyramided to a very high price, but it could not stop it. It ultimately resulted in the wrecking of the bank, because when finally the stock had to take the inevitable tumble, not being worth any such price as it had reached, the public lost what it had invested in it.

Mr. FESS. Precisely. I sympathize with what the Senator has in mind. So the attempt to build up prejudice against these companies, quoting enormous profits, and then ascribing the profits to the gamblers in the securities as the profits of the companies, is a pitiable display, indicating a lack of information as to what the profits are.

Mr. President, as to the evidence before the committee, I think the Senator from Vermont has covered the case conclusively, and it would be a useless consumption of time for me to enter that field again, as I intended to enter it.

I was glad to have the statement from the Senator from Nevada as to the testimony of the former Postmaster General. No one could sit for a week during the examination in chief and the cross-examination and listen to that ex-official and not be convinced that he knew what he was talking about. Not only that, but, however one might disagree with him as to the methods he employed in the administration of the law, no fair-minded man will state that he did not administer the law as he thought the authority was given to him to administer it. While there might be a difference of opinion as to the attitude of the officer, there certainly can be no difference of opinion as to his authority to do what he did.

Mr. President, my feeling in this matter is very largely due to my apprehension of the baleful effects upon our people of the indefensible and un-American conduct of high officials in the manner in which the cancelation of the air-mail contracts was carried out. I have not said anything about what appears to be collusion on the part of certain people who, disqualified at the time and not able to secure contracts, undertook to have the existing contracts canceled in order that the way might be opened for them to get contracts. I have always realized that that situation existed. I am not one of the Senators who loosely make charges without evidence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'MAHONEY in the chair). The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. FESS. I will take my time on the bill. Rumors were afloat, and from many sources information came to me which indicated that there was an organized effort and that a department of the Government was not free from it, to have the way opened for the negotiation of new contracts, not because the existing contracts were illegal or because the service under them was unsatisfactory but only because somebody, dissatisfied, wanting a contract, saw no other way of getting it.

It would appear, if we go back over the connection of the various assistants in the Post Office Department except one—I exculpate one of them—every one of whom was in some form or other officially connected with some of the companies which wanted contracts, the suspicion is very strong that the set-up even from the beginning had in mind the cancelation of these contracts.

I need not go further than the testimony which has been brought out by the Senator from Vermont. He did not have the assistance of three departments of the Government, and he did not have 22 paid employees of the Government in his office drawing enormous compensation to assist him. All he had was what, through his unaided efforts, he was able to find in the record, but even with that limitation we have had presented to us evidence which strongly points to what I believe to be the correct explanation of the cancelation of the air-mail contracts.

Mr. President, it is no defense to say that the contractors, thus injured, have their opportunity to go into the Court of Claims. That is no defense whatever. The Government ought to realize that a party to these contracts is the Government itself. One party is the company, the other party is the Government, the Government exercising, by its ipse dixit—as the Senator from Vermont stated when he quoted John Marshall—the mere element of power because it is a sovereign. There is not anything more powerful, so far as law goes, than the Government itself, and the Government is here a party to the contract, and it cannot be sued except by its own permission. If it were the ordinary case of party of the first part and party of the second part, neither of which was the Government, and the case were to be heard in a department of the Government, it would be different; but instead of that the Government itself is the party of the first part. It becomes the prosecutor, it becomes the court, it becomes the judge, as well as the jury; it becomes the enforcer of the law. Can it, then, be said that we can cancel a contract with the Government, a party in chief to the contract, and merely leave the way open for the other party to be heard in the Court of Claims? That is the flimsiest excuse for an inexcusablee performance I ever heard, and no government should be guilty of such a shameful performance as that.

I know that in some quarters the reputation and character of an individual count for very little. Good opinion of the people toward an ex-officer of the Government may not mean anything to some, but it does mean a great deal to many of us. Shakespeare has said:

> Who steals my purse steals trash;
> • • • • •
> But he that filches from me my good name
> Robs me of that which not enriches him,
> And makes me poor indeed.

When I realize what the Postmaster General preceding the present one had before him as a problem, and observe how he performed the duties of his office in the solution of that problem, and see his achievements to the honor of the Government, then find that, in the face of that achievement, he is assailed as a corruptionist and perpetrator of fraud, I submit that is a poor reward for unselfish service rendered to his Government by a man who felt while he was rendering the service that it would meet with the plaudits of the American people.

To blast a reputation of that kind does not mean anything to some people, but it does to me. I regret such action more than words can tell. The only relief afforded, Mr. President, was that the man assailed was permitted to come before an adverse committee and defend himself. After having been subjected to adverse examination he came out of it with the universal recognition on the part of every fair-minded man, whether on the committee or off the committee, that he had told the truth about a great accomplishment in which there was not a scintilla of dishonor. There might have been a question as to whether we or others would have done as the former Postmaster General did, or whether we would have done it in the same way, but he did what he did in accordance with law.

I have some concern about any effort to besmirch the character of anyone. I do not care who he is; it matters not where he lives; it matters not to what religion he belongs or to what political party he belongs. If an effort is made to besmirch his character, I am concerned.

When a suggestion was made not long ago that a great Democratic officer of this administration was under suspicion because, it was stated, a brother of his had been in some way identified with some dealings with the Government, I resented the hint that was thrown out. I would resent it as quickly with respect to a Democratic official as I would with respect to any Republican official. I have had the same feeling with regard to any effort that is made to besmirch.

There is a distinguished citizen of the District of Columbia against whom some vague suspicion is directed because he possessed in his own right a certain amount of silver. This man is a great Democratic politician, a man of high rank in his party. I resent any inference such as that which is made in connection with the possession of silver. At any rate, if a man is charged with anything, he should not be found guilty until he has had a chance to be heard.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should like to have someone enlighten me as to why there is any moral or political turpitude attached to anyone who buys silver. Is not silver simply a commodity?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I do not think there is any turpitude connected with the purchase of silver, unless the purchaser is an officer of the Government who uses his influence to get the price of silver boosted, and takes advantage of such boosting in price. Such action, of course, would be subject to criticism.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I am not speaking of an action such as that. I am speaking of the publication of the list of men engaged in business who have bought silver. I should like to know on what ground the Congress or any of us has a right to pillory such people in the press with the vague suggestion of suspicion of wrongdoing, when silver is a commodity which has no monetary standing now except the silver bullion which we happen to own and against which we issue certificates, which circulate as money.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I feel as the Senator from South Carolina does on that subject. The possession of silver would be subject to criticism, the Senator will agree with me, only in the event that someone interested in boosting the price had purchased a large amount with the intent to profit by the boost in price. Such action, of course, would be serious, and I would criticize it.

Mr. SMITH. I will state what I have in mind.

If silver is a commodity on the market, which it is, is not every effort being made on the part of the Government to raise its price, as well as all other commodity prices, and are we not all joining to help accomplish that object? All of us have more or less of a vested interest in commodities. Therefore, we who are legislating in an endeavor to raise the price of commodities are as justly subject to the criticism that our conduct is reprehensible as are the people who are trying to raise the price of silver.

I desire to enter my protest against the publication, for the purpose of criticizing their conduct, of the names of people who buy silver.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I am talking under a limitation of time. I enjoy these interruptions, but I do not want them to take my time. I must conclude my remarks very soon. I appreciate what the Senator from South Carolina has said.

Mr. President, my make-up is such that it hurts me when a loose charge is made against an official, especially if that official is the type of man who is giving the best of his life to the service of his country; and if any charge is made, the fullest opportunity for hearing certainly ought to be given before the verdict is pronounced.

Mr. President, the great aviation industry of this country, which was the pride of the world, was stricken down. It might, under some circumstances, and it will, rebuild and, therefore, will survive that injury. That injury can be survived; but it is no defense for anyone who strikes down a great industry to say that it will revive. It may revive under other officers.

The face-saving effort in this bill has been most amusing to me, in that it states that a company whose contract has been canceled cannot bid unless it reorganizes—as if, when the company reorganizes, it is not the same company! We used to believe that a principal was responsible for the acts of his agent. Merely to change the agent is the most silly performance I have ever seen. Here we are trying to hide behind this indefensible action by saying we are not going to destroy the particular investment provided the companies will reorganize, as if that will change in the slightest degree the institution whose capital is invested, to say nothing about the inconvenience of making the reorganization!

But, Mr. President, far and away above the injury done to an individual, and the break-down and destruction of a great industry in which there has been invested from $300,000,000 to $500,000,000 of capital, with the employment of the finest personnel we know of in the world, is the injury—I have no language that can properly express it—to our own country by reason of the violation of the most elemental principle of American rights—a thing which is abhorrent to every American citizen who believes in fair play, a conduct pregnant with the elements of break-down in all that we have prided ourselves on in America, a conduct instinct with the elements of tyranny, denying liberty; an act universally condemned in every newspaper-editorial column without regard to politics or religion, and with no reference to locality, from North to South, from East to West—a universal condemnation that is overwhelming and will be irresistible.

We shall never survive an act of striking down not only the reputation of great men but the right in property of thousands of citizens and the abandonment of every principle that is elemental in the foundations of American rights and liberty. It is that wrong which ought to be corrected.

I shall support the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], which does attempt to right the wrong, as far as it can be done. If that shall fail, I shall support the substitute offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN].

While I do not like the commission idea, Mr. President, if our purpose today is to build up a great industry, probably the commission idea would be the better one; but if the purpose is only to carry the mails, there is not the slightest need of any commission.

That could easily be taken care of; but if there is combined the carrying of the mails with what was major in the purpose of the Watres Act, namely, to advance the art of flying, to build up a great industry, involving the investment of American capital and the employment of skilled personnel, then the commission idea would have considerable weight.

I agree with the Senator from Nevada that aviation is in its infancy; it is just at its beginning; and one of the faulty features of the pending bill, that certainly will show itself to be faulty before a year shall have elapsed, is that it limits the contracts to 1 year. Originally they were for 3 years, but that was too short. There can be no such thing as building up the American aviation industry if we limit contracts to 3 years, to say nothing of 1 year. The advance in the art of flying is not alone dependent on new inventions, new equipment, and new appliances; it also is dependent on building greater and better and safer planes.

Recently an airplane, representing the last word in aircraft construction, costing $230,000, one of the finest planes ever built, went down in an accident. No one survived that accident who could testify as to its cause. I asked an expert how the accident possibly could have happened. He stated that it was thought that that plane was so speedy—and it was one of the speediest planes in the air—that a vibration was started, and that vibration ultimately caused a break, and, just as the bending of a wire too often will cause it to break, so that continued and rapid vibration finally split the tail of the plane, which dropped off, and all the passengers were killed. That was one of the finest planes ever put in the air. Somebody must be able to ascertain what is the cause of such accidents and how defects which cause them may be remedied. It takes talent, money, and time to do that; and it will never be done within the terms of a short contract, because no one but a fool would invest his money in such expensive equipment if he did not know that he had some assurance of a contract lasting sufficiently long to afford some opportunity of recouping the cost. The limit in the pending bill prescribing a contract period of 1 year defeats one of the main purposes, which is the development of the art of flying.

That is only one of the objectionable provisions in the pending measure, which is a hodge-podge, intended as substitute, quickly and without consideration, to take the place of legislation under which the aviation industry has been builded up.

Mr. President, it is these considerations that have impressed me with the terrible result of conduct that is wholly inexplicable, except, as has been brought out here, that it was desired to bring about the cancelation of these contracts by hook or crook in order to afford an opportunity to someone who was not in on a contract to get a contract. While the present Postmaster General and his department have indicted the former Postmaster General for not giving the contract to the lowest bidder with reference to the Avigation Co., the same Postmaster General, the same postal department, will do precisely what Mr. Brown did and which they condemned. They have already received bids which are so low that they are investigating to ascertain, first, whether the companies so bidding are really in existence, as the Avigation Co. was not; secondly, whether the companies are financially able, as the Avigation Co. was not; and, thirdly, whether they can meet the requirements of the contract. If they cannot, the Post Office Department will reject the low bid, as they ought to reject it, just as Mr. Brown rejected the low bid, as he ought to have rejected it. When it comes to putting into operation the new contracts, it will be found that the Department will follow, in the main, what was done back in the former administration of Mr. Brown.

When it comes to considering the various provisions of the bill, I shall take time very briefly to discuss them, but I do not intend unduly to delay the Senate, and I am perfectly willing that the bill should come to a vote today, so far as I am concerned. I will, however, take time to point out some of the defects in this proposal, which I think should not pass.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a chart showing by management groups certain statistics of mail and passenger-carrying operations for the calendar years 1931 and 1932. It is the same as the chart which appeared on the wall of the Chamber for several days. It is copyrighted, but the author has agreed that it may be placed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that it will be necessary to secure the approval of the Joint Committee on Printing to have inserted in the RECORD a chart such as that the Senator presents.

Mr. BLACK. I think the Chair is correct. I have just ascertained that it will be necessary to obtain the consent of the Joint Committee on Printing, and I, therefore, desire to withdraw my request.

DEBTS DUE THE UNITED STATES BY FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I desire to take a few minutes of the time of the Senate to discuss to some extent the present situation with reference to the war debts due the United States.

Of course, everybody knows that the money due this country from foreign countries with whom we were associated during the World War belongs really to the American taxpayer; and if there is any default in the payment of the debts, the people of this country will be forced to shoulder the obligations. This is true, of course, of all those who have defaulted or may default; but I wish to speak today of Great Britain, the leading nation of Europe, on whose empire the sun never sets, a nation heretofore justly priding herself on the punctual and honorable discharge of her obligations.

What a laughing-stock any man would have made of himself who would have predicted, a few years ago, that the bonds of Great Britain would ever be defaulted, or that she would fail to pay punctually every pound and shilling due from her to a creditor.

Mr. President, this Government holds $4,600,000,000 of the bonds of Great Britain for moneys advanced to her during and after the World War. The report of the World War Foreign Debt Commission, on page 116, shows that during the calendar year 1934 we are scheduled to receive from Great Britain a total of $182,780,000, of which $150,780,000 is interest, and $32,000,000 represents payments on principal.

In some prior years, especially since the depression began, there has been some question of the actual ability of various foreign debtors to pay what they had agreed to pay. This year, however, Great Britain's prospective surplus over and above all commitments—other than her debt to this country—is about £29,000,000, which at the exchange rate of $5.16, quoted by the New York Times of Tuesday, is approximately $149,000,000, or almost exactly the amount of the interest payment due this year to the United States. It is natural to suppose that this highly creditable surplus would be applied to this acknowledged debt. But what do we hear from abroad?

I read from the New York Times of Wednesday, April 18:

WAR DEBT IGNORED IN BRITISH BUDGET; INCOME TAX IS CUT—WASHINGTON RECALLS SIMILAR STAND IN 1933, WHEN TOKEN PAYMENTS WERE MADE—HALF OF PAY CUT RESTORED—FULL UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS ARE RESTORED

LONDON, April 17.—For the third time Neville Chamberlain, Chancellor of the Exchequer, presented to Parliament today a budget in which no provision is made for payment of anything to the United States on account of the war debt.

When he remarked he was repeating the omission of 1932 and 1933 in this respect, there were murmurs of "Hear! Hear!" and other exclamations of approval, with some cheers from all parts of the crowded House of Commons.

* * * * * * *

The actual text of Mr. Chamberlain's brief reference to the American debt in today's budget speech was: "Neither last year nor the year before did I make any provision for the payment of the war debts to America, nor for the receipt of war debts or reparations by ourselves. In the absence of any fresh development, I propose to follow precisely the same course this year."

To admirers of Great Britain, to those who for years have looked upon her as the very embodiment of probity and rugged honesty, these statements are not only astonishing but shocking.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. In justice to the people of Great Britain as a whole, is it not fair to state that, as a matter of fact, Mr. Chamberlain was very seriously taken to task by one of the leading members of the House of Commons for what was designated as a very dishonorable course?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator is quite right. I have a report of that incident taken from a Washington newspaper, which I shall later ask to have inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. Chamberlain continued:

Twelve months ago I had to report to the House that the outcome of the year was a deficit of £32,000,000. This year I am in the happy position of being able to present almost exactly the opposite case, for I find myself at the end of the year in possession of a surplus of £31,143,000, being the difference between revenue of £724,567,000 and expenditure of £693,419,000.

And now we come to a further quotation from Mr. Chamberlain which must bring great cheer to the taxpayers of the United States, upon whom the Senate has just voted to impose the burden of hundreds of millions of taxation in addition to their already-crushing load:

Mr. Chamberlain * * * allowed himself some restrained symbolic exultation, when he referred to the country's returning prosperity. He said Great Britain had now "finished the sad story of 'Bleak House' and was beginning the opening chapters of 'Great Expectations.'"

Mr. President, how many individual debtors in this country could not have great expectations if, with a careless wave of the hand, they could get rid of the mortgages on their homes, their grocery and furniture and clothing and garage bills, and spend their money for new purposes without regard to valid existing debts?

Comparisons between his own and less fortunate nations kept cropping out in Mr. Chamberlain's radio speech.

OTHERS STILL FACE SACRIFICES

"While in other countries," he said, "pay cuts and reductions in social services are still having to be faced, while elsewhere the taxpayer is still searching vainly for relief from his burdens and is forced to contemplate still further contributions to the State, here we can feel we have passed the worst and can venture to remove a substantial portion of the load which we have been carrying without fearing we shall have to put it back."

But Mr. Chamberlain is an adroit statesman. The similarity between the $149,000,000 of surplus revenue and the $150,000,000 of interest owed the United States was too striking to be allowed to stand. The Times tells us, further:

On the basis of the old rate of taxation and by still adhering to his economy program of 3 years ago, the Chancellor of the Exchequer could have counted on a surplus during the coming year of £29,100,000. But by reducing the income tax from 5s. to 4s. 6d. in the pound, and by increasing the Government pay roll and unemployment insurance, he has deliberately cut that surplus to £796,000.

Can it be that the Chancellor of the Exchequer deliberately sought ways and means to diminish, if not wipe out, the indicated surplus so that he could truthfully say that there were no funds available to pay America at the very time when America is cutting down her payments to her soldiers, reducing their hospital care, paring down pensions to widows and others, reducing relief expenditures, and seeking in every conceivable way to raise the money imperatively needed to pay her governmental expenses?

A final quotation from the New York Times of Tuesday, April 17, is as follows:

While the welcome tendered to the last surplus has been tempered somewhat by the talk about war-debt payments to the United States, the British have found refuge in the contention that charity begins at home.

Mr. President, the use of the word "charity" here is unfortunate. We have heard it before in connection with Great Britain. On Monday, January 8, 1923, in opening negotiations for the settlement of the British debt to the United States, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, Hon. Stanley Baldwin, said at page 92 of report of the Debt Funding Commission:

> In common with the rest of the world, we have watched with admiration the open-handed charity of America to the stricken countries of Europe. * * * The generosity of America is proverbial, but we are not here to ask for favors or to impose on generosity.
> We want * * * a square deal, a settlement that will secure for America the repayment to the last cent of those credits which the United States Government established in America for us, their associates in the war.

Brave words. Honorable words. But, alas, obsolete words today.

Consider the scorn heaped upon Germany because she made a scrap of paper of her treaty with reference to the neutrality of Belgium. How do the obligations of Great Britain read of which Mr. Chamberlain in effect makes scraps of paper when he dismisses them with the off-hand statement that he proposes to make no provision for their payment? Here is the language of one of them, a bond representing one one-thousandth of the total indebtedness of $4,600,000,000:

> The Government of the United Kingdom, hereinafter called Great Britain, for value received, promises to pay to the United States of America * * * on the 15th day of December 1984, the sum of $4,600,000 * * * and to pay interest upon said principal sum semiannually * * * at the rate of 3 percent per annum from 15th December 1922, to 15th December 1932, and at the rate of 3½ percent per annum thereafter.

There are other minor provisions in the bonds, but nowhere in them is there anything making the payment of interest or principal in any way conditional upon the receipt of reparations from Germany, or debt payments from France and other continental nations to Great Britain, or otherwise. The obligation is a flat, unconditional one.

How was the proposal worded which Great Britain made to the United States, which was accepted on June 19, 1923, and which resulted in the delivery of the bonds to which reference has just been made? It is found on page 106 of the Debt Funding Commission's report, and begins with these words:

> Whereas Great Britain is indebted to the United States as of 15th December 1922, upon demand obligations in the principal amount of $4,074,818,358.44 * * * and Great Britain is further indebted to the United States, as of 15th December 1922 on account of interest accrued from 15th April and 15th May 1919 on said $4,074,818,358.44, principal amount of demand obligations.

These are the words, not of the creditor but of the proposal of the debtor, signed by Ambassador Geddes at Washington on June 18, 1923.

In paragraph 10 of this proposal it was provided that upon delivery of the $4,600,000,000 of bonds stipulated for in the agreement, the demand obligations of Great Britain in the principal amount of $4,074,818,358.44 should be canceled and surrendered; and this was done. Those obligations, which we gave up upon the delivery of the later ones, read as follows—a sample of the form used in the case of each of the debtor countries is given on page 314 of the Debt Funding Commission's report:

> The Government of ———, for value received, promises to pay to the United States of America * * * the sum of ——— dollars on demand, with interest from date hereof at the rate of 5 percent per annum.

There is other language in the obligation; but, as in the case of the formal bond, there is nothing making payment contingent upon the receipt of reparations or other payments by the debtor country from its own debtors.

In submitting to Congress the agreement freely and voluntarily arrived at by the two Governments, the Debt Funding Commission said—page 97:

> This settlement between the British Government and the United States has the utmost significance. It is a business settlement fully preserving the integrity of the obligations * * *.

Alas! The settlement preserved the integrity of the obligations, but that integrity must be preserved by observance of the settlement if it is to be real integrity.

The settlement with Great Britain was made by Andrew W. Mellon, Charles E. Hughes, Herbert Hoover, Reed Smoot, and Theodore E. Burton, comprising the then membership of the World War Foreign Debt Commission. All but one of these eminent statesmen are still living. What would any one of them say of the integrity evidenced by Mr. Chamberlain's current statement in Parliament?

The then President of the United States, Warren G. Harding, in submitting the British settlement to Congress for ratification, said in his message of February 7, 1923—page 98 of the Commission's report:

> Amid widespread clamor for the cancelation of World War debts as a fancied but fallacious contribution toward peace * * * the British commission came to make acknowledgment of the debt, to put fresh stamp of approval upon its validity, and agree upon terms for its repayment. * * * It (the settlement) is a recommitment of the English-speaking world to the validity of contract.

Strange words, when read in the light of the recent utterances of the British Chancellor of the Exchequer, who undertakes to set aside a bilateral contract by unilateral action—the very thing the French Government acknowledged could not be done lawfully, and then proceeded to do unlawfully.

> The failure of the British undertaking would have spread political and economic discouragement throughout the world, and general repudiation would have likely followed in its wake. But here is kept faith—willingly kept, let it be recorded.

Ah, yes! "Kept" for how long? For about 10 years, and then carelessly broken and dismissed in callous fashion, amid "exclamations of approval, with some cheers from all parts of the crowded House of Commons", according to Wednesday's New York Times.

True, as President Harding said, there had been attempts from time to time, prior to the British settlement, to bring about either a pooling or a general cancelation of debts, or to make their payment contingent upon the payment of German reparations. These attempts were promptly squelched by President Wilson and his subordinates in high official position, just as similar efforts were frowned upon and denied by Presidents Coolidge and Hoover; and when President Roosevelt, after listening to the pleas of the British for a reduction of the agreed payments, found their proposals unreasonably low, he very properly declined even to submit them to Congress, so the British delegation went home and reported to its Government, which now proposes, if press reports are to be believed, not merely to reduce its payments but to discontinue and default them.

On May 24, 1920, Assistant Secretary Rathbone thus expressed the American position (p. 71 of debt-funding report):

> I * * * shall not now attempt to discuss the matter * * * beyond restating the view of the United States Treasury that the questions relating to the debt of the British Government to the United States Government must be settled by those two Governments only, and that the indebtedness of other governments to the American Government or to the British Government, and the payment by Germany of reparations, are in no way related to the postponement of interest upon and funding of the obligations of the British Government held by the United States Treasury.

On June 26, 1920, Secretary Houston handed to Sir Auckland Geddes, the British Ambassador, a memorandum reading in part as follows (p. 71 of report):

> It has been at all times the view of the United States Treasury that questions regarding the indebtedness of the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to the United States Government * * * had no relation either to questions arising concerning the war loans of the United States and of the United Kingdom to other governments or to questions regarding the reparation payments of the central empires of Europe.

And I call especial attention to the next sentence, as showing notice, continuing notice, to the representatives of Great Britain that this was the case during the time the loans were being made:

> These views were expressed to the representatives of the British Treasury constantly during the period when the United States Government was making loans to the Government of the United Kingdom and since that time in Washington, in Paris, and in London. The views of the President on the subject were stated at length to the Prime Minister in a letter dated May 5, 1919.

This letter of President Wilson does not seem to be quoted in the Commission's report, but a very interesting letter of later date will be quoted presently.

On July 23, 1920, Mr. Norman H. Davis—recently our roving ambassador in Europe—wrote as follows to the Ministry of Finance of France (while this letter is to France, it is general in its statement of the American position):

The vague reports to the effect that it had been decided that the various intergovernmental debts and the settlement thereof would be made to depend directly upon the settlement of collection from German reparations appeared to have a rather adverse reaction here.

It is felt here that the obligation on the part of debtor countries to liquidate war debts is a matter entirely independent of the reparation problem.

What would not Mr. Norman Davis give to recall these words, and those that immediately followed, and which are of the greatest significance? I quote further from his letter:

The moneys were loaned before the question of reparations from Germany could be considered.

Obviously, therefore, their repayment could not even impliedly be contingent upon the payment of reparations, much less expressly.

Mr. Davis continues:

It is hard for the people of this country * * * to see the justification for any plan of assignment of German reparation obligations in payment of war debts, or the using of reparation payments as a controlling index of payments to be required on war loans, when these loans and reparation obligations have no connection, and receipts from reparations have at best only an indirect and partial relation to the ability of the debtor nations to pay.

That this is emphatically true is shown by the fact that even in the present year of depression the British Government, as stated by the New York Times article, has—or had before it voluntarily proposed methods of dissipating it—an uncommitted surplus of $149,000,000 in a year when it received no German reparations.

Mr. Davis continues:

If the Secretary of the Treasury were inclined to tie up the reparation question with intergovernmental indebtedness, which I believe is not the case, it would be impossible for him to do so without congressional approval, which, in my judgment, is out of the question.

So even Mr. Norman H. Davis is sometimes everlastingly right!

So far I have quoted from subordinates of the President of the United States—Woodrow Wilson—who held the office throughout the World War, and who participated so influentially in framing the treaty which terminated it. Now I quote his own words on this subject from a letter to Lloyd George.

Writing on August 5, 1920, President Woodrow Wilson said, page 73 of debt-funding report:

It is highly improbable that either the Congress or popular opinion in this country will ever permit a cancelation of any part of the debt of the British Government to the United States in order to induce the British Government to remit, in whole or in part, the debt to Great Britain of France or any other of the allied Governments, or that it would consent to a cancelation or reduction in the debts of any of the allied governments as an inducement toward a practical settlement of the reparation claims.

Let these latter words be read carefully and remembered by those, here or abroad, who talk loosely of intimations or promises or hints given either in Washington or at Lausanne to the effect that a reduction of German reparations would be met by a corresponding reduction of American claims on Europe. Every sensible person knows that no one but Congress had any authority to give any such intimations or promises or hints, and that Congress by specific joint resolution declared it to be against the policy of this country that the debts should be in anywise reduced or canceled. Those who seek to make the credulous believe that President Hoover promised Laval anything of the kind, or that any American representative or unofficial observer at Lausanne made any such commitment, are apparently of the belief that the exclusive power of Congress over the debts was not a matter of common and universal knowledge.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will take time on the bill.

President Wilson continues:

Suggestions looking to the cancelation or exchange of the indebtedness of Great Britain to the United States were made to me when I was in Paris. Like suggestions were again made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the early part of the present year. The United States Government, by its duly authorized representatives, has promptly and clearly stated its unwillingness to accept such suggestions each time they have been made. * * * The views of the United States Government have not changed. * * * It fails to perceive the logic in a suggestion in effect either that the United States shall pay a part of Germany's reparation obligation or that it shall make a gratuity to the Allied Governments to induce them to fix such obligation at an amount within Germany's capacity to pay.

By what form of words could our representatives, from President Wilson down, have indicated more clearly to the European nations that there never was, and never could be, any hooking up of reparations with Europe's debts to this country? Every President from Mr. Wilson down has reiterated this position. Failing to convince either Democratic or Republican administrations of the justice of such a connection of reparations with war debts, the debtors now propose to take the matter in their own hands, and deliberately, dishonorably, openly repudiate and default their obligations.

The 5½-percent bonds of the British Empire, payable to individuals, are quoted on the New York Stock Exchange at about 118. The 7- and 7½-percent bonds of the French Government are quoted at 176—an almost incredible figure. Even the bonds of Italy stand at a trifle over 100. Three issues of Belgian bonds range from 102 to 107⅛. Yet some of these Governments have flatly defaulted on their bonds payable to the United States Government, while others have made only trifling payments, defaulting as to the great bulk of the debt.

What reason has the investor who buys bonds on the New York Stock Exchange to believe that in the days to come the European governments which flout their obligations to the United States Government will be any more honorable in their dealings with the private citizen of the United States? We have seen how Germany first cut down and then defaulted on reparations, and followed this action by various complicated schemes to avoid paying her private debts in this country and elsewhere. It would not be unreasonable to predict the same course for the private obligations of other European governments if and when they find it inconvenient to pay them in the days to come. "Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus" is still a true maxim.

In connection with the foreign debts in general, we have some notable utterances from American statesmen who at this day are justly honored with the confidence of their country.

The eminent Secretary of State, Hon. Cordell Hull, said in 1925, page 234 of report of Debt Funding Commission:

If the debts due the American Government from foreign governments should be canceled or scaled, the American people must pay taxes to meet the interest and to redeem the principal to a corresponding extent. The money loaned foreign governments was raised from the people of the United States in war taxes and war loans. They did this at great effort and many sacrifices. * * * (P. 236:) We are * * * in the act of forgiving * * * foreign debts and assuming them ourselves. The American taxpayers during coming years will want to know, and will finally discover, the reason why.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, the distinguished Speaker of the House of Representatives, told the Ways and Means Committee of the House on January 6, 1926, the methods used in raising the money to loan to our associates in the war. I read from page 370 of the Debt Funding Commission's report:

I remember most distinctly the time when we were collecting this money to lend. * * * We sent speakers over the United States, and we placed posters everywhere. We made it unpopular and disagreeable for a man to live in a community unless he contributed to this fund that we were going to loan * * *, and we urged our people to give and to give until it hurt, and I remember that throughout the country those men who did not give as much in their localities as they thought they ought to give were held up to public ridicule and their gateposts were painted yellow, and all that sort of thing, and appeals were made in theaters and in churches throughout the land, and, with the American flag flying above the pulpit, preachers advised people to give and to give, and advised them they were loaning their money and not giving it, at 4½ percent, insisting that it was being done in order that we might help to make the world a safe place in which to live.

Ah, yes, Mr. President! All of us remember those days. The man who had some savings who would not loan them to his Government so that it, in turn, might loan them to our associates in Europe, was termed "yellow" and a "slacker", as Mr. RAINEY truthfully says.

Secretary of State Hull further says (p. 411 of Debt Funding Commission's report):

When the peace convention was being held, there was not a word said publicly about any question as to the absolute validity of these debts by any government. There were some whisperings and some undertone conversations, but no serious discussion of them.

They were all entered into freely and voluntarily as the portion that each government should contribute in connection with the war, and the debts were considered as commercial and not as political debts. And that has not been seriously questioned since that time except by individuals, or sometimes by officials who wanted to get unusually good terms.

So much for the history of the debts. Amid the present picture of gloom, repudiation, default, and disregard of solemn promises regarding the debts there is, however, one bright spot that richly deserves mention.

The second country to fund its obligations to the United States was Finland, which came into existence as an independent state after the Great War. Finland has a small, hard-working population, a severe climate, limited natural resources, and no great manufacturing or commercial enterprises; yet little Finland is the one country of all our European debtors which has a 100-percent record of honorable fulfillment of obligations! Every cent due from her up to date has been promptly and cheerfully paid. There has been no shifty, evasive talk about difficulties of exchange, or adverse balances of trade, or the world-wide depression, or falling off of commerce, or lowered standard of living, or pleas of poverty—though, judged by the standards of other debtors, Finland is a poor country—nor has failure of Finland to receive payment from others been used as an excuse for nonpayment of her own debts. Finland evidently believes in the simple, old-fashioned, now almost obsolete doctrine of common honesty. Having borrowed and promised to pay, she simply pays, without being dunned, and without availing herself of the example set by her rich and powerful neighbors.

What simple-minded folks the Finns must be! Why pay merely because you have promised to do so? Why be honest when the greatest nations of the world set you the example of dishonesty? Why not welsh when welshing has become the fashion? But, no! The Finns have not yet learned that sort of ideal; and we trust they never shall.

All honor to little Finland, which has kept her plighted word when nations with a thousand times her resources and many times her population have failed to do so. May the great United States, with its vast resources and immense population, never act less honorably than this little nation of the far north.

Mr. President, let there be no more talk about scraps of paper in the present circumstances; not while the very governments which vehemently condemned Germany for violating her undertakings are busily and deliberately engaged in doing exactly the same thing—though they are themselves the greatest creditor nations of the world—and, in effect, saying to the Nation that trusted them, "Well, what are you going to do about it?"

Mr. President, beyond any question the American people expect the debts to be paid in full by the foreign governments. That is the attitude of Congress, as expressed by joint resolution adopted almost unanimously. In my judgment, the American people will never agree to cancelation or even reduction of the debts due us from foreign nations.

There was published in the Washington Herald a day or two ago the following article:

LONDON CAN PAY UNITED STATES AND WON'T, COMMONS TOLD—WEDGEWOOD, LABORITE, TAUNTS CHAMBERLAIN—ASSERTS WAR DEBT SHOULD BE HONORED

LONDON, April 19.—The British Government is able to pay its war debt to the United States but does not want to, Col. J. C. Wedgewood, Laborite M.P., charged in the House of Commons tonight.

Deploring the 1934–35 budget's failure to make provision for payment of the $85,670,765 installment due in Washington June 15, Wedgewood made this plea:

"After all it is not the case that we cannot pay. We can pay, but we don't want to.

WOULD HONOR DEBT

"I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will assure the House tonight that there is some prospect of our honoring our debt and paying back what we owe to a people who lent us the money when we were in so difficult a position."

To this appeal, Chancellor of the Exchequer Chamberlain gave the same calm answer with which he has met every question on the debt:

"I do not think we can usefully make any statement regarding the American debt."

The British Government, it was learned, intends to keep silence until it ascertains whether President Roosevelt will consider Britain a defaulter country under the terms of the Johnson bill, which prohibits such countries floating loans in the United States.

Britain is hopeful that its two previous token payments will save it this stigma. Secretary Hull is understood to be consulting legal authorities on the point.

WEDGEWOOD BITTER

With biting sarcasm, Wedgewood recalled that the House of Commons cheered Chamberlain's omission of provision for the debt in the budget and his subsequent assertion that the $139,350,000 1933–34 surplus made relief for the British income-tax payer possible. The tax was reduced 6 pence on the pound. The Laborite said:

"A few days ago the Chancellor said he was confident that before long Chile would resume payment of her financial obligations. It is really true that the House of Commons cheered at the relegation of Great Britain to the status of a South American Republic?

"For myself, I would sooner lose 6 pence on the pound and be able to look America in the face.

"The Chancellor has realized a surplus of £31,000,000, and it would have been a great thing if he had paid the money over to the people to whom it rightly belongs."

William Craven Ellis, conservative, suggested that Britain offer to pay in goods and services.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he closes?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am very glad to yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. There is a good deal of speculation as to how far the Government may go under the terms of the Johnson Act, which forbids the further loaning of money to any government which has defaulted. There is a great deal of speculation with regard to the extension of credits to the various governments in the interest of increasing foreign business. There is no doubt about France having defaulted. She would be out under the Johnson law. There might, however, be some doubt about Britain, in that there has been accepted what is known as a "token" payment, as I understand, in order to avoid putting Britain in the category of a defaulting nation.

What is the judgment of the Senator as to whether the payment of a mere fraction of what is due is keeping the country which does so out of the category of those which are in default?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am not sure I can enlighten the Senator. Rather, I do not believe I know anything more about it, if as much, as the Senator does; but I can give the Senator my own personal opinion.

Mr. FESS. I should like to have it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In my opinion, the payment of only a small sum on this indebtedness really amounts to a default. I do not think it is anything less than that.

Mr. FESS. It certainly is a default to the extent that that is not paid which is due. That part is in default.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The point is that the Congress of the United States, which has full power in this matter, has gone on record by joint resolution as refusing to permit any cancelation or any reduction. The so-called "token" payment is a tremendous reduction, to say the least, in the amount due; and, since it is a reduction, it runs afoul of the expressed judgment and sentiment of Congress, which means the sentiment of the country as expressed by Congress. Therefore, I should think it would be a default.

Mr. FESS. That would exclude Britain, also.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I should think it would be a default, notwithstanding the fact that the belief is currently held in many circles in the United States that the administration, which has no power to reduce the indebtedness in the slightest degree, has nevertheless given encouragement to the theory of "no default" to the defaulting nations.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, another question. Under the Johnson Act, which forbids the extension of further credit to defaulting countries, would the power be denied to the Government to extend credit to institutions which operate under authority of foreign governments which have defaulted, making such institutions the agencies of the foreign governments? Let me illustrate by a concrete example.

Russia has defaulted, but there are certain organizations in Russia which are operating on behalf of Russia. Would the R.F.C., which has wide powers for loaning, be authorized to loan to one of those organizations in Russia, which may not on the face of it be acting as an agent of Russia, but evidently is? Would the inhibition containeed in the Johnson Act forbid the R.F.C. to extend credit to any organizations in Europe in the interest of building up foreign trade, thus not extending the credit directly to the Government?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I should think the inhibition would be effective against any such extension of credit.

Mr. FESS. That is a question which is quite important.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator knows that I think money should not be loaned to Russia under any circumstances. They now owe us some hundreds of millions of dollars which they have never paid. They have defaulted on all of it.

Mr. FESS. I do not mean Russia alone. I am wondering whether we are giving authority to an agency of our Government to loan to the agencies of other governments in order to get around—I do not mean deliberately and wrongfully to get around—the prohibition contained in the act, but, in order to avoid what might be regarded as an obstacle against the loan, as written in the Johnson Act.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Through the so-called "Export Bank."

Mr. FESS. Yes. It is quite an important question, I think.

THE AIR MAIL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3170) to revise air-mail laws.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read an article which appeared in the Washington Star of today entitled "Only Five Air Mail Bids Are Received. Rates Average More Than Amounts Formerly Paid for Contracts."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Without objection, the article will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

ONLY FIVE AIR-MAIL BIDS ARE RECEIVED—RATES AVERAGE MORE THAN AMOUNTS FORMERLY PAID FOR CONTRACTS

Opening of the second batch of bids for temporary air-mail contracts today surprised officials of the Post Office Department when only five bids were received for four routes at rates averaging more than the amounts formerly paid under the air-mail contracts canceled more than 2 months ago.

There was competition for only 1 of the 4 routes, the low bid amounting to 28.8 cents per airplane-mile, which was the average of the bids received a week ago on 17 routes.

ONLY FEW VIEW OPENING

The bids were opened at noon in the office of Stephen A. Cisler, general superintendent of the Railway and Air Mail Services, before an apathetic and comparatively small group of aviation people, as compared with the crowd which attended the opening of last week's bids.

Today's bids ranged from the low of 28.8 cents to 45 cents per airplane-mile, the latter being the maximum allowed by the Department. The average rate paid per airplane-mile under the annulled contracts was 37 cents.

Today's bids were as follows:

1. Kohler Aviation Corporation, on the route from Detroit to Milwaukee, 45 cents per airplane-mile.
2. Northwest Airlines, Inc., Fargo, N.Dak., to Seattle, approximately 1,285 miles, 33.75 cents per airplane mile.
3. American Airlines, Inc., Fort Worth, Tex., to Los Angeles, 1,325 miles, 39.5 cents per airplane-mile.
4. American Airlines, Inc., Newark to Chicago, 800 miles, 39.5 cents per airplane-mile.
5. Northern Air Transport, Inc., Fargo to Seattle, 28.8 cents per airplane-mile.

American Airlines, Inc., is the group dominated by Errett L. Cord, whose failure to cut a larger figure in the bidding a week ago came as the outstanding surprise of the Post Office Department's campaign to restore air mail to private carriers. Today's bid on the Newark-Chicago route is on the eastern section of the midtranscontinental line, upon which bids as a whole were received last week.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. FESS. I ask that the amendment be again stated.

Mr. McKELLAR. The amendment merely proposes to substitute "one" for "three" in line 23 on page 12 of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. In the same line, Mr. President, I move to strike out the letter "s" in the word "years", so as to make it read "year."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. On page 15, line 1, after the word "than", I move to strike out "six" and insert in lieu thereof "three."

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I ask to have that amendment again stated.

Mr. McKELLAR. I move to strike the word "six" and substitute therefor the word "three", so as to make it 3 months instead of 6 months. I take it there will be no objection to that.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have just come into the Chamber. I ask to have the pending amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to amend the committee amendment on page 15, line 1, after the word "than", by striking out the word "six" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "three."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to be heard on that amendment.

I think the country has witnessed something which has happened in the railroad world that ought not to be passed by without some emphasis being placed upon it. There was danger a short time ago of a universal strike on the railroads, which would have tied up commerce, and no man by the wildest flight of his imagination could tell how much damage such a strike might have caused at this particular time.

The President was unable to get the warring factions together. He appointed a coordinator, a man of outstanding character in the railroad world, Mr. Eastman, who, after vainly trying to do something to get the warring factions to agree, failed and gave up the task. He advised, however, when he quit, that there should be another conference of the parties directly interested; and so there met around the conference table the representatives of all the first-class railroads in the United States on the one side and the representatives of the railroad employees on the other, representatives who were conceded to have been chosen by the labor unions.

I mention this now because in that conference there was no company union. There is going over the country now, I believe, a kind of propaganda, the object of which is to give some life to the so-called "company unions." I never could understand, in my study of the various disagreements that have occurred from time to time in years past between capital and labor, why any fair-minded man could object under the circumstances to having the representatives of labor in such conferences chosen, freely and uncoerced, by the laboring men themselves.

A company union, in reality and in practice, is a union of laboring men controled by the employers of labor. A conference between delegates from a company union and the representatives of employers' associations is simply a conference dominated on both sides of the table by the employers. It is true that in theory there can be, and probably there are instances where company unions are acting purely in the interest of the laboring man, but, as a matter of practice, that is something that is almost unknown.

Here were the representatives of 21 organized bodies of railroad unions on one side of the table, and those who own the railroads, represented by those whom they had chosen, on the other side. After everybody else had failed, this body of representative men reached an agreement satisfactory to both sides and satisfactory to the American people, and avoided what I feared might have been a real catastrophe. At the conclusion of their conference they were congratulated upon their work by the President of the United States; and also, by Mr. Eastman, the coordinator.

I mention this only to show that in the conflict between labor and capital there is, in my judgment, no place for the company union. Capital is represented, as it should be, by representatives of its own choosing; and to put upon the other side of the table representatives, with whose selection the employers have had something to do simply means that there will be no agreement reached which will be fair to labor and fair to the people of the country.

Here was an instance where labor was represented, it is conceded, by agents chosen by labor. That is only fair; it is only right, and it is only another illustration showing that, if we are to have arbitration between capital and labor, both sides of the table must be represented by agents who are selected from their respective organizations uncoerced, uninfluenced, and absolutely free and independent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. On page 15 I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as a substitute for the first paragraph of section 6, and ask that the clerk may state the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the amendment reported by the committee on page 15, it is proposed to strike out lines 11 to 25, both inclusive, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby empowered and directed to fix and determine, as soon as practicable, the public convenience and necessity for all air transportation routes and the fair and reasonable future rates of compensation for the transportation of such mail matter by airplane common carriers and the service connected therewith, but not in excess of the rates herein provided for, prescribing the method or methods by weight or space or both, or otherwise, for ascertaining such rates of compensation, and to publish the same, and orders so made and published shall continue in force until changed by the Commission after due notice and hearing and shall take effect on such route immediately after the expiration of any outstanding air-mail contracts then in force and effect under existing contracts made by the Post Office Department.

Pending the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission hereunder, air-mail contractors to whom the Postmaster General may have heretofore awarded contracts pursuant to competitive bidding may continue to carry the mail for not to exceed 9 months at the rates and for the compensation fixed in such contracts.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator explain the difference between the original provision and the amendment now proposed?

Mr. McKELLAR. The only difference is that, instead of advertising for new bids where competitive bidding has already been had on temporary contracts, such contracts are kept in force until the Interstate Commerce Commission shall take over the jurisdiction to fix rates. I think there will be no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. In line 25, page 16, I move to strike out the word "another" and insert "director." The purpose of that amendment is to limit the language to officers or directors and not to take in employees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. On page 17, line 3, I move the same amendment, namely, to strike out "another" and insert "director."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the amendment to the committee amendment is agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Now, Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to be added to the amendment reported by the committee, which I ask the clerk to read. This amendment merely provides for a commission as suggested by the President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the committee amendment on page 24, after line 4, it is proposed to insert the following as new sections:

SEC. 24. The President is hereby authorized to appoint a commission composed of seven members to be appointed by him, not more than four members to be appointed from any one political party, for the purpose of making an immediate study and survey, and to report to the next Congress its recommendations of a broad policy covering all phases of aviation and the relation of the United States thereto. Should the President appoint as such commissioners officials already in the employ of the United States, such members of the Commission shall serve without further compensation. Members appointed who are not already in the service of the United States shall receive compensation of not exceeding the compensation of a Senator or Congressman.

SEC. 25. Such Commission shall organize by electing one of its members as chairman, and it shall appoint a secretary whose salary shall not exceed $7,500 per annum. Said Commission shall have the power to pay actual expenses of members of the Commission in the performance of their duties, to employ counsel, experts, and clerks, to subpena witnesses, to require the production by witnesses of papers and documents pertaining to such matters as are within the jurisdiction of the Commission, to administer oaths, and to take testimony, and for such purpose there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $100,000.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, the amendment does not say anything about how long the commission is to continue.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, it does; the proposed commission is required to report to the next session of Congress.

Mr. FESS. After which it is to be discontinued?

Mr. McKELLAR. It will be discontinued after its report, in the very nature of things.

Mr. FESS. If it is a permanent commission the appointees ought to be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is a temporary commission only. If the Senator does not think the language makes that sufficiently plain, I should be perfectly willing to have the Senator suggest an amendment that will make it a temporary commission.

Mr. FESS. I should like to look the amendment over.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think there can be no doubt that, under the amendment as proposed, the commission will be temporary.

Mr. FESS. If it is to be a temporary commission, I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the purpose of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee to the committee amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. That concludes the amendments to be offered in behalf of the committee.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, if I may, I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee about section 17, which appears on page 22 of the draft of the bill. Is it the intention by that section to make any change in the radio law, or just what is the purpose of it?

Mr. McKELLAR. The purpose is to be sure that the companies bidding on the contracts shall have proper radio facilities. The committee invited Judge Sykes, chairman of the Radio Commission, to testify, and he did so. His experts came with him. They assured us that the language would provide the installation of proper radio facilities by all who received contracts, that being a very important matter for the safety of airplanes, as the Senator knows.

Mr. WHITE. May I ask whether the representatives of the Radio Commission approved the section or voiced disapproval of it?

Mr. McKELLAR. They approved it after it was amended. The language at first gave preferential rights. The representatives of the Radio Commission suggested that the words "equal facilities" be inserted, and they were inserted at their request. I think it was entirely fitting and proper and efficient for the purpose to be accomplished.

Mr. WHITE. Am I to understand that it is not the purpose and that, in the judgment of the Senator, it is not the effect of the language to change existing radio law?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is correct.

Mr. WHITE. That prompts the inquiry, then, Why is it here?

Mr. McKELLAR. It was deemed important that radio facilities should be had by all who bid on the contracts, for the safety not only of the mails but of the passengers carried at the same time, and that a specific provision with reference to radio should be incorporated in the section to insure that end.

Mr. WHITE. I do not want to appear to be fretty about this matter, but I want to understand it fully. Does it mean equal facilities are to be given airplanes carrying mail but not carrying passengers with those planes which are carrying passengers?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; it gives them equal facilities. The engineer, whose name I have forgotten——

Mr. WHITE. Dr. Jolliffe?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; he and the chairman of the committee testified that this language would accomplish exactly what the committee desired, and that is to make flying as safe as the use of radio can make it. It will not interfere with others, but give equal facilities to all.

Mr. WHITE. I am wholly in sympathy with that purpose. The only thing that troubles me is that we have always heretofore proceeded on the theory that these matters should be in the control of the Federal Radio Commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. This provision does not affect that control at all.

Mr. WHITE. I was querying whether this in any way limited the complete freedom of action which is now in the Commission under the present law.

Mr. McKELLAR. It does to this extent, that the Radio Commission will be required to give equal facilities, and that they will continue to do as they do under the present law. Such is the necessity for the use of radio in the management and control of airplanes that it seemed very necessary and wise to have such a provision in the bill.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD excerpts from an article appearing in the Baltimore Sun of today showing the range of bids received in response to the advertisements. The bids which were opened yesterday by the Post Office Department, as compared with former rates, show that they are not higher and could not be higher.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOUR MORE ROUTES OPENED

At the Post Office Department today bids on four more air-mail routes were opened. On the Newark-Chicago line, 800 miles, the only bidder was American Airlines, Inc., the reorganized American Airways controlled by E. L. Cord. The bid was 39.5 cents per airplane mile. The previous rate was 44 cents.

On the Fort Worth-Los Angeles route, 1,325 miles, American Airlines, Inc., was likewise the only bidder at 39.5 cents. The former rate was 45 cents.

On the Detroit-Milwaukee route, 265 miles, where amphibian planes have to be used, the only bidder was Kohler Aviation Co., at 45 cents, the maximum. The former rate was also 45 cents.

TWO CONCERNS BID

On the Fargo-Seattle route, 1,285 miles, there were two bidders, Northwest Air Transport, Inc., bid 28.8 cents, and Northwest Airlines, Inc., the reorganized Northwest Airways, bid 33.75 cents. The former rate was 45 cents.

If the low bids in these cases should be accepted, the general average of pay for air-mail transport will be increased, but the cost will still be considerably less than under the old contracts.

It was learned today that the appeal of William P. MacCracken, Jr., who was punished by the Senate for contempt, will be heard by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia on May 7.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] about section 14. I have two inquiries which I cannot answer in regard to what is intended by the section. An inquiry comes to me from a pilot——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from Ohio in his own right, but the Senator has already spoken on the bill and cannot, under the unanimous-consent agreement, speak again on it.

Mr. FESS. I am not speaking.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the committee amendment as amended. However, unless there is objection the Senator from Ohio will be recognized.

Mr. FESS. No, Mr. Chairman; I will wait until another amendment is offered and then take my time on it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I now offer formally the amendment intended to be offered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] and myself, which lies upon the table. I ask that it may be stated.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BLACK. I understand the committee amendment has not been adopted. I thought the Senator wanted to offer his amendment as a substitute.

Mr. AUSTIN. It is intended to be offered as a substitute.

Mr. BLACK. Has the committee amendment been adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate committee amendment as amended has not been adopted. The question is now on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] in behalf of himself and the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] to the amendment of the committee as amended. The clerk will state the amendment to the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senators from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] and from Maine [Mr. WHITE] offer the following amendment in the nature of a substitute:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That pending the enactment of permanent air-mail legislation, and in order to meet the existing emergency with respect to the carrying of the mails by air, the Postmaster General is authorized and directed, with the consent of the holder, to revive and reinstate any air-mail contract or route certificate in force on February 9, 1934, and thereupon the person, firm, or corporation holding any such air-mail contract or route certificate shall have all the rights and privileges and be subject to all the duties and obligations as existed under such contract or route certificate at the time of the cancelation thereof.

"SEC. 2. (a) The President is authorized to appoint a commission, to be composed of five members, to make a thorough investigation and study of the facts and conditions pertaining to the operation of the air mail and all civil and military aeronautics and to report to the Congress, on or before January 3, 1935, the results of its investigation and study, together with its recommendations for a permanent air-mail policy. The President shall select a chairman from among the members of the commission.

"(b) Each member of the commission other than a member who is an officer or employee of the United States, shall receive such compensation for his services as the President may fix.

"(c) For the purposes of this section the commission or any member thereof, when authorized by the commission, may hold hearings, administer oaths, and require by subpena the attendance and testimony of witnesses or the production of books, papers, documents, or other evidence, or the taking of depositions before any designated individual competent to administer oaths. The provisions of section 9 of the Federal Trade Commission Act, insofar as applicable, shall apply in the case of any person required by subpena to appear and testify or produce evidence before the commission created by this act.

"(d) The commission may appoint and fix the compensation, without regard to the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, of such experts and employees, and may make such expenditures, including expenditures for personal services and rent at the seat of government and elsewhere, for travel, and for printing and binding, as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this act. All expenses of the commission shall be allowed and paid upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman of the commission.

"(e) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

"(f) The commission shall cease to exist upon the submission and acceptance of its report to the Congress pursuant to the provisions of this section."

It is proposed also to amend the title so as to read:

A bill to create a commission to report upon a permanent air-mail policy, and to provide for the carriage of the mails by air pending the enactment of permanent legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who desires to be recognized at this time.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry. I do so because I assume that the Chair made his decision upon the advice of the parliamentarian. Does the decision mean that when we have limited debate we are denied the privilege of asking the chairman of the committee, the author of the bill, a question on some item in the bill? Is that regarded as debate, so that we are denied the privilege of asking questions?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). The Chair would not so hold; but the Chair recognized the Senator from Ohio in his own right, and the Senator from Ohio proceeded to propound certain questions to the Senator from Tennessee, who did not have the floor. If the unanimous-consent limitation on debate was to be made effective, manifestly the only proper course was to lay before the Senate something on which the Senator from Ohio could be heard. The Chair acted on his own initiative, and there is no possible fault attaching to the parliamentary clerk.

The Chair now recognizes the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, in the future when unanimous consent is asked for a limitation of debate, I shall not consent to the limitation if it means that the chairman of the committee and the author of the bill cannot be asked questions as to the meaning of a particular item in the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. So that there may be no misunderstanding, I desire to say that I know the Senator from Ohio will recognize the difference between a Senator having the floor in his own right and a Senator rising while another Senator has the floor in order to ask a question. I do not think the unanimous-consent agreement would prohibit the Senator from Ohio asking a question, provided some other Senator had the floor; but if the Chair should permit a Senator who had exhausted his time to get the floor under the guise of asking a question, he might make a speech of an hour's duration under the pretext that it was a question if he desired to do so.

As I say, I think there is a difference between a Senator having the floor after he has used up his time and another Senator having the floor and being questioned by a Senator who has used up his time. It seems to me there is a clearly defined difference between the two.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to assure the Senator from Ohio that I had no purpose not to conform to his wishes about the matter.

Mr. FESS. I want the Members of the Senate to understand that we are cooperating on this side to get a vote. I so stated to the leader of the majority and to the chairman of the committee, and I want to continue to do that; but if I am to be put in a position where I cannot get information on this bill, with many items of which I do not agree, unless I take the floor, I will take the floor and offer various amendments, and we will take all the time that is necessary.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not think there is any occasion for confusion or resentment about this matter. The Senator from Ohio had a perfect right to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question while the latter had the floor. The Senator from Ohio, of course, could not insist upon taking the floor in his own right on the last amendment, because he had exhausted his time under the agreement.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire further to say to the Senator from Ohio that while I hesitated for a moment, it was because I was not sure that I had the answer to the Senator's question. It was not because of any desire to interfere with the Senator's question.

Mr. FESS. The question I desired to ask was one that was submitted to me by a pilot. I should like the Senator, in the light of section 14, to give me the information, so that I may pass it on to this gentleman.

The question is as follows:

This section (sec. 14) designates only mail pilots, and provides for the interchange of only mail pilots and pilots of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Reserve pilots. There is no such thing as a strictly mail pilot. Is it your understanding of this bill that the training of the service pilots by the operators is to be done only on actual mail planes?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think the answer is to be found in lines 15 and 16 on page 20:

And of the air-mail pilots, to be designated in such manner as the Postmaster General may determine.

Mr. FESS. I think the power is there.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I think the power is there.

Mr. FESS. Another question that my correspondent asks is as follows:

I should also like to ask if it is your opinion that a pilot holding a legal scheduled air transport pilot's license may be called upon to fly a scheduled air transport primarily built to carry passengers, which transport contains both passengers and mail. Is that pilot to be classified as a mail pilot within the meaning of the act above?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think unquestionably he would.

Mr. FESS. The third question my correspondent asks is—

Whether pilots who are not members of the Officers' Reserve will be compelled to take time off, so that the name "service pilots" can be given the commercial training provided for in the bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will ask the Senator to repeat the question. I am not sure that I understand it.

Mr. FESS. The last question is—

Whether pilots who are not members of the Officers' Reserve will be compelled to take time off, so that the name "service pilots"—

That is a phrase in the bill, "service pilots"— can be given the commercial training provided for in the bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think that would be determined by the power given the Postmaster General to designate the classification under which they might come in, and it seems to me that power is full and ample. Of course, the matter will go to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator is right, when he says that the phrase in line 16, page 20, "in such manner as the Postmaster General may determine", is broad enough to cover it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am quite sure it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before the question is put, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Barkley	Bulow	Connally
Ashurst	Black	Byrnes	Coolidge
Austin	Bone	Capper	Costigan
Bachman	Borah	Caraway	Couzens
Bankhead	Brown	Carey	Davis
Barbour	Bulkley	Clark	Dieterich

Dill	Hatch	Norris	Thomas, Okla.
Duffy	Hatfield	O'Mahoney	Thompson
Erickson	Hayden	Overton	Townsend
Fess	Johnson	Patterson	Tydings
Fletcher	Kean	Pope	Vandenberg
Frazier	King	Robinson, Ark.	Van Nuys
George	La Follette	Robinson, Ind.	Wagner

Goldsborough	Long	Sheppard	Wheeler
Gore	McCarran	Shipstead	White
Hale	McGill	Smith
Harrison	McKellar	Steiwer
Hastings	McNary	Stephens

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont a question. As I understand from what information I have been able to gather, the pending amendment would put the main contracts, which were canceled, back in the position they held before they were canceled.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It would reinstate all of them?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. My information, from what I consider to be a reliable source, is that some of them were found to be fraudulent. Am I misinformed, in the Senator's opinion?

Mr. AUSTIN. The Senator is entirely misinformed. None of them has been found to be fraudulent. The Postmaster General has presumed them to be fraudulent. No company has had an opportunity to be heard on the question. There has been no judicial decision, or anything that looks like a judicial decision, on the question. All the contracts have been treated alike. All of them jointly have been said to be annulled. In my opinion, they have not been annulled. What has taken place cannot be an annulment. In any event, the Cabinet officer who has this matter in charge has taken the mail away from them. That is all that has been accomplished, in law. This amendment is designed to restore the status quo before the mail was removed, and it would preserve the status quo until the question of fraud can be heard and determined and until a report of a permanent commission, which was recommended by the President, may be submitted and accepted. This proposal provides for the appointment of such a commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment, as amended, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE]. On that question the yeas and nays have been requested.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEIWER (when his name was called). Has the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. STEIWER. I have a pair with the Senator from Iowa upon this question. I therefore withhold my vote. I understand that if he were present, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], and vote "nay." I am advised that if present, the Senator from West Virginia would vote "nay."

Mr. WALCOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], who is detained by illness. Not knowing how he would vote, I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] with the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS];

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]; and

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

If present, the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT], the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON], and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], would vote "yea." All these Senators are necessarily absent.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I regret to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] are detained from the Senate on account of illness.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY (after having voted in the negative). Has the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Iowa, which I transfer to the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], who is necessarily absent. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], and let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 56, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. AUSTIN and Mr. WHITE in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment, as amended, was rejected.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], and myself I now offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the committee as amended. I ask that the amendment to the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment to the committee amendment as amended.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the amendment reported by the committee as amended and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That section 3 of the Air Mail Act, approved February 2, 1925, as amended (U.S.C., supp. VII, title 39, sec. 463), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. The rate of postage on air-mail letters shall be 5 cents for each ounce or fraction thereof. The rate of postage on air-mail postal cards, which the Post Office Department is hereby authorized to furnish in distinctive design, shall be 2 cents each."

SEC. 2. Section 4 of the Air Mail Act, as amended (U.S.C., supp. VII, title 39, sec. 464), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. The Postmaster General is authorized to provide for the transportation of air mail over an air-mail route by any carrier operating aircraft over such route, under authority of the Department of Commerce, on a fixed daily schedule. The Postmaster General shall pay compensation for such transportation at the fixed rate of 2 mills per pound-mile, except that the average compensation paid to any carrier for transportation over any route shall not exceed 50 cents per airplane-mile in any calendar year."

SEC. 2. Section 6 of the Air Mail Act, as amended (U.S.C., supp. VII, title 39, sec. 465c), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. (a) The Postmaster General shall, upon the application of any carrier who held a route certificate on February 9, 1934, issue to the holder in substitution therefor a route warrant, unless the applicant has been adjudged, as hereinafter provided, to be disqualified under section 3950 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 39, sec. 432). Such route warrant shall be for a period of not exceeding 10 years from said date, and shall provide that the holder thereof shall have the right—so long as he complies with all rules, regulations, and orders that may be issued by the Postmaster General for meeting the needs of the Postal Service and adjusting mail operations to the advances in the art of flying, passenger and express transportation, and advances in national defense—to carry air mail over the route set out in such warrant, or any modification thereof, at the rates fixed under the terms of this act as amended. Nothing in this section shall be construed to invalidate any route certificate.

"No person shall be denied such a route warrant for the reason that he, or his predecessor, is asserting or has a claim against the United States because of a prior annulment of any contract or route certificate by the Postmaster General.

"Every person whose contract has been annulled by the Postmaster General shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such sum as will justly remedy the damages caused to him by such annulment, in the manner provided by paragraph 20 of section 24 or by section 145 of the Judicial Code, as amended, notwithstanding the amount in controversy. Any appropriation out of which payments upon the said contracts were authorized to be made is hereby made available for payment of such damages.

"No person shall be presumed by the Postmaster General to be disqualified to contract for carrying the mail, or to exercise such route warrant by virtue of the provisions of section 3950 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 39, sec. 432); but every such person who may be accused thereof shall be tried and adjudged disqualified in a District Court of the United States in the judicial district wherein is the residence of such person sought to be disqualified under said section 3950 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 39, sec. 432), before the Postmaster General shall deny such route warrant to him for such cause.

"Whenever the status of ineligibility is intended by the Postmaster General to be asserted against one who held a contract or certificate February 9, 1934, the Postmaster General shall invoke the jurisdiction of said court by a complaint setting forth the essential facts constituting the alleged offense presented to a district judge of said district. Said judge shall immediately call to his assistance, to hear and determine the complaint, two other district judges. Said complaint shall not be heard or determined until at least 10 days after notice of hearing and copy of complaint have been served upon the accused.

"No person shall be disqualified because of combinations to prevent competitive bidding, or agreements respecting air-mail routes established under the act of April 29, 1930 (U.S.C., supp. VII, title 39, secs. 464, 465c, 465d, 465e, and 465f) unless a majority of judges shall determine after hearing, by three judges, according to the usual procedure in District Courts of the United States, that said combinations or agreements were made fraudulently and collusively and illegally by such person.

"Any such warrant may be canceled by the Postmaster General at any time for willful neglect on the part of the holder to carry out any rule, regulation, or order, or for any violation of this act as amended. Notice of such intended cancelation shall be given in writing by the Postmaster General, and 45 days from the date of service of the notice shall be allowed the holder in which to show cause why the warrant should not be canceled.

"(b) It shall be unlawful for any person holding a route warrant under this act to have any financial interest in or to participate in the management of any other air-mail line or part thereof which is competitive in transcontinental service, or to control, be controlled by, or be under the common control with another person holding a route warrant issued under this act or a route certificate, for another competitive transcontinental line or part thereof. The term 'person', when used in this subsection, includes individual, partnership, association, and corporation. For the purposes of this subsection a person having the power (whether or not legally enforceable, and whether exercisable directly or indirectly) to manage the affairs or direct the policies of another person shall be deemed to have control of such other person."

SEC. 4. Section 7 of the Air Mail Act, as amended (U.S.C., supp. VII, title 39, sec. 465d), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. (a) The Postmaster General, when in his judgment the public interest will be promoted thereby, may extend or consolidate routes which existed on February 9, 1934, or which may be established after such date under this act, as amended, may modify accordingly the warrants for the routes thus extended or consolidated, and may establish a new air-mail route and issue a route warrant therefor, in any case where such route or extension of a route does not duplicate any route set out in a route warrant issued and in force under this act, as amended, the holder of which has a letter of authority from the Department of Commerce for the carrying of passengers over the route set out in such warrant. No route warrant shall be issued for any contemplated route or be modified for any extension of a route under this section to or for any carrier which has not owned and operated an air-transportation service over such route or extension, as the case may be, for a period of 6 months or more prior to the issuance of such warrant. Route warrants issued under this section shall have the same force and effect and be subject to the same conditions and limitations as in the case of route warrants issued under section 6 of this act, as amended.

"(b) Any extension in effect on the date of enactment of this amendatory section or any route or extension established after such date under this section over which an air-mail service has been operated for a period of 12 consecutive months, shall be canceled by the Postmaster General whenever the average plane load of mail carried between stations over the entire distance of the route or extension does not exceed 25 pounds per day for any consecutive 3 months of operation after the expiration of such 12 months' period, except that any extension forming the whole or part of the main-line route of the holder of a route warrant may, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, be exempted from cancelation under this subsection."

SEC. 5. The Air Mail Act, as amended, is further amended by adding after section 9 the following additional sections:

"SEC. 10. The Postmaster General, if in his judgment the public interest will be promoted thereby, upon application of any carrier which has exchanged its route certificate for a route warrant on or before July 1, 1934, may pay such carrier for transportation of air mail an amount in addition to the fixed pound-mile rate provided in section 4 of this act, as amended. Such amount shall be determined by the Postmaster General upon a formula, standardized for all operators and calculated to create a financial inducement and incentive to competitively develop the aeronautical industry, to improve its efficiency to the end of making it self-supporting, to encourage the development of safety, speed, additional space for carriage of passengers and express, and to promote the national defense.

"SEC. 11. (a) When used in this act the term 'pound-mile' shall mean the transportation of 1 pound of air mail 1 mile.

"(b) For the purpose of computing compensation for transportation of air mail under this act the mileage for transportation between any points having more than one connecting route shall be the mileage of the shortest route between such points.

"SEC. 12. The Postmaster General shall promulgate forthwith the formula, referred to in section 10 hereof, for determining the rates of payment in addition to the fixed pound-mile rate to be made to route warrant holders transporting air mail under this act. He shall publish, in his annual report, said formula, the payments made thereunder, and the improvements in the standard of efficiency, economy, safety, speed, space for the transportation of passengers and express, and contribution to the national defense upon which said additional payments were based.

"SEC. 13. The Postmaster General shall provide in the rules, regulations, and orders made by him under section 5 of this act standards of qualifications of pilots, including experience in operating aircraft on night schedules, standards of working conditions for pilots, copilots, mechanics, and laborers, which shall not be less safe and efficient than working conditions in effect in 1933, and standards of compensation to be paid by the holder of such warrant to such employees which shall be not less than the rate of compensation paid by air-mail carriers during 1933, unless the same be changed from time to time through the medium of collective bargaining through representatives of their own choosing, or other bargaining, standards for landing fields, lighthouses, radio stations, and other means of communication and aids to navigation, as well as standards of planes and their equipment."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], in the nature of a substitute, for the amendment reported by the committee, as amended.

Mr. AUSTIN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the committee amendment as amended.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], and vote "nay."

Mr. STEIWER (when his name was called). Referring to my pair which was announced upon an earlier vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea"; and the Senator from Iowa, with whom I am paired, would, if present, vote "nay."

Mr. WALCOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from California [Mr.

McADOO], who is absent on account of illness. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TYDINGS. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] and vote "nay."

PUBLICATION OF LIST OF SILVER HOARDERS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I do not want now to take any time of the Senate, and I do not want to speak on the pending bill. I do wish, however, to place in the RECORD my personal objections to the publicity that is being given the so-called "silver bloc" by reason of the fact that somebody in the stock market has bought a certain supply of silver. I am rather curious to know why when the cotton-relief legislation was being considered there could not have been some publicity given as to those who had sold cotton "long", and why when we were considering copper legislation there could not have been given some kind of publicity about that. What has been done in the case of silver I regard as an effort to show that the silver bloc is in on some mysterious market-rigging scheme, because those interested in silver have taken action in the hope of having a little bit fairer weather. What has resulted is as ridiculous a kind of publicity as could have been given.

A majority on this side of the Chamber has stood for silver as money on the ratio of 16 to 1. A majority of the Democratic side has so voted ever since I have been here; and I believe that those of us who have voted that way are entitled to have as fair a share of publicity given to the effect that the commodity of silver might expect Government relief the same as the commodity of flax, or the commodity of cotton. I trust, however, they will not be as badly disappointed in their hope that something will be done for silver as they were in the hope that something would be done for some other commodities, because many people believing that some of our legislation was going to be beneficial bought stocks the same as they bought the commodity silver. Some of them were disappointed, and some of them were not disappointed, but it would be just as ridiculous today for the Secretary to publish a list of people who bought cotton in anticipation of cotton legislation as to publish a list of those who bought silver in anticipation of silver legislation.

THE AIR MAIL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3170) to revise air-mail laws.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment by way of a substitute, which I have heretofore filed with the clerk at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment, as amended, which will be stated.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the amendment in the nature of a substitute submitted by Mr. McCARRAN.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, for nearly 2 hours yesterday, and for some time the previous day, I went considerably at length into the terms, conditions, and provisions of the proposed amendment. I hope that I enlisted the interest of Senators to the extent of causing them to read carefully every provision of the proposed amendment. I think it would now be taking up the time of the Senate unnecessarily to have the entire amendment read. So I will ask that the reading of the proposed amendment be dispensed with at this time and that I may have the 30 minutes to which I think I am entitled under the rules to discuss the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the reading of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment will be dispensed with and the amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. McCARRAN for the amendment of the committee as amended is as follows:

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. McCARRAN to the bill (S. 3170) to revise air-mail laws, viz, strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"TITLE I—GENERAL PROVISIONS

"(c) 'Carrier' means any person, including a lessee, trustee, or receiver engaged in air commerce;

"(d) 'Aircraft' means any contrivance now known, or hereafter invented, used, or designed for navigation or flight in the air, except a parachute or other contrivance designed for such navigation but used primarily as safety equipment;

"SEC. 4. (a) The Federal Aviation Commission shall be composed of five commissioners, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one of whom the President shall designate as chairman.

"(b) The commissioners first appointed under this act shall continue in office for the term of 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 years, respectively, from the 1st day of July, anno Domini 1934, the term of each to be designated by the President; but their successors shall be appointed for terms of 6 years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired time of the commissioner whom he shall succeed. Any commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. No vacancy in the commission shall impair the right of the remaining commissioners to exercise all the powers of the commission. Not more than three of the commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party.

"(c) No person in the employ of or holding any official relation to any carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or owning stock or bonds thereof, or who is in any manner pecuniarily interested therein, shall enter upon the duties of or hold such office. Said commissioners shall not engage in any other business, vocation, or employment.

"(d) Each commissioner shall receive an annual salary of $, payable in the same manner as the judges of the courts of the United States. The commission shall appoint a secretary, who shall receive an annual salary of $, payable in like manner. The commission shall have authority to employ and fix the compensation of such other employees as it may find necessary to the proper performance of its duties. Until otherwise provided by law, the commission may hire suitable offices for its use, and shall have authority to procure all necessary office supplies. Witnesses summoned before the commission shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States.

"(e) All of the expenses of the commission, including all necessary expense for transportation incurred by the commissioners, or by their employees under their orders, in making any investigation, or upon official business in any other places than in the city of Washington, shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman of the commission.

"(f) The principal office of the commission shall be in the city of Washington, where its general sessions shall be held; but whenever the convenience of the public or of the parties may be promoted, or delay or expenses prevented thereby, the commission may hold special sessions in any part of the United States. It may, by one or more of the commissioners, prosecute any inquiry necessary to its duties, in any part of the United States, into any matter or question of fact pertaining to the business of any carrier subject to the provisions of this act.

"(g) The commission may conduct its proceedings in such manner as will best conduce to the proper dispatch of business and to the ends of justice. The commission shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed. Any member of the commission may administer oaths and affirmations and sign subpenas. A majority of the commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, except as may be otherwise herein provided. The commission may, from time to time, make or amend such general rules or orders as may be requisite for the order and regulation of proceedings before it, including forms of notices and the service thereof, which shall conform, as nearly as may be, to those in use in the courts of the United States. Any party may appear before the commission and be heard in person or by attorney. Every vote and official act of the commission shall be entered of record, and its proceedings shall be public upon the request of any party interested.

"(h) That the commission shall, on or before the 1st day of December in each year, make a report, which shall be transmitted to Congress, and copies of which shall be distributed as are the other reports transmitted to Congress. This report shall contain such information and data collected by the commission as may be considered of value in the determination of questions connected with the regulation of air commerce, together with such recommendations as to additional legislation relating thereto as the commission may deem necessary; and the names and compensation of the persons employed by said commission.

"COMMISSION TO ARBITRATE DISPUTES BETWEEN CARRIERS AND EMPLOYEES

"SEC. 5. The commission is authorized and directed at such times as may be necessary, and under such rules and regulations as may be promulgated by it, to hear and determine any disputes, complaints, or grievances arising between carriers and its employees.

"TITLE II—CERTIFICATES OF PUBLIC CONVENIENCE AND NECESSITY

"SECTION 6. (a) Applications for certificates of public convenience and necessity for any operations as a carrier in interstate air commerce (including extension or abandonment of lines) may be made by a carrier in such manner and form as the commission shall by regulation require.

"(b) Any carrier (or its predecessor in interest substantially all of whose assets are owned or controlled by applicant) which on January 1, 1934, and for a period of at least 6 months prior thereto, was in bona fide operation of interstate air commerce on a daily schedule of at least 250 miles (except as to interruptions in operations over which the carrier had no control), shall be entitled, as a matter of course, to receive from the commission immediately following the passage of this act, and without application therefor, a certificate of public convenience and necessity which shall be applicable to any route or routes operated by the carrier during the aforesaid period.

"(c) Any carrier engaged in interstate air commerce which is not entitled to receive a certificate of public convenience and necessity under provisions of paragraph (b) of this title, and being desirous of securing such certificate, may apply to the commission for a certificate of public convenience and necessity under such rules, regulations, and procedure as shall be prescribed by the commission.

"(d) Upon the filing of an application under this section the commission shall immediately serve upon each carrier then holding a certificate of public convenience and necessity due notice of the filing of the application, and within 15 days from the date of service of such notice upon carriers then holding certificates, any such carrier, or any party having an interest in the issuance of the certificate applied for, may file with the commission, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the commission, a protest or memorandum of opposition to the issuance of the certificate for which application has been made, and within 20 days from the date of receipt of such protest by the commission the commission shall set a date for public hearing upon the application and the protest filed with respect thereto. The rules governing the conduct of such hearings and/or rehearings shall be determined by the commission.

"(e) In all cases in which a carrier applying for a certificate of public convenience and necessity is not entitled thereto as a matter of course under paragraph (b), the commission may by order issue the carrier a certificate with respect to the whole or any part of the operations proposed in the application if the commission finds that the operations of such carrier to be covered by the certificate will serve the public convenience and necessity. If the commission finds that the whole or any part of the operations proposed in the application will not serve the public convenience and necessity, it may by order deny the issuance of a certificate covering the operations with respect to which such finding is made.

"(f) The commission, in issuing a certificate of public convenience and necessity, may attach to the exercise of the privileges granted thereby such reasonable terms and conditions as in its judgment the public convenience and necessity may require, shall specify the route or routes over which, and the fixed termini, if any, between which, the carrier is authorized to operate, and shall specify the character and extent of service to be performed. The commission may from time to time modify such terms and conditions in such manner as the public convenience and necessity may require.

"(g) Certificates of public convenience and necessity may be transferred by agreement, operation of law, or otherwise, but any such transfer shall be valid only upon order of the commission consenting to the transfer and under such regulations as the commission shall prescribe. If the commission refuses to consent to the transfer, it shall so declare by order. The commission shall consent to any such transfer only if the commission finds that the public convenience and necessity will continue to be served by the transferee.

"(h) Any carrier holding a certificate of public convenience and necessity issued under this act may operate chartered aircraft in interstate air commerce or may occasionally depart from its regular route for the purpose of providing special service to a point beyond such route, within, or out of such route, subject to police regulations of the several States, and in accordance with such regulations as the commission may prescribe in the interests of the public convenience and necessity.

"(i) Certificates of public convenience and necessity issued under this act shall be effective from the date specified therein, and shall continue in effect until suspended or revoked as hereinafter provided, or until their expiration, if issued for a limited time.

"(j) Upon due notice thereof to all carriers, or other parties interested therein, and upon hearing before the commission under such rules as may be prescribed by the commission, the commission shall have power by order to suspend or revoke a certificate of public convenience and necessity of a carrier for failure to comply with any requirements of this act: Provided, That in all cases of revocation for cause any party interested therein, or affected thereby, shall be fully apprised as to the grounds for the revocation and shall be permitted to produce and cross-examine witnesses and introduce such evidence as may be relevant and material to the proposed revocation.

"(k) Proceedings for such suspension or revocation may be instituted before the commission upon its own initiative or upon complaint filed by the Governor or other officer or agency of a State in which the carrier operates, if such Governor or other agency is authorized by law of the State to file complaints under this act. The commission shall enter its order in any such proceeding either suspending or revoking the certificate, or denying such suspension or revocation.

"(l) It shall be unlawful for any carrier engaged in air commerce to be offered, permitted to receive, or transport United States mail by aircraft unless such carrier has in force a certificate of public convenience and necessity under this act and complies with the terms and conditions thereof.

"TITLE III

"SERVICES AND CHARGES

"SEC. 7. (a) It shall be the duty of every carrier subject to this act engaged in interstate air commerce to provide and furnish transportation of passengers, mail and property, upon reasonable request therefor in accordance with the orders of the commission.

"(b) It is hereby made the duty of all carriers subject to the provisions of this act to establish, observe, and enforce just and reasonable classifications of property for transportation, with reference to which rates, tariffs, regulations, or practices may be made or prescribed.

"(c) No carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall, after July 1, 1934, directly or indirectly, issue or give any interstate free ticket, free pass, or free transportation for passengers, except to its employees and their families, its officers, agents, surgeons, physicians, and attorneys, to post-office inspectors, customs inspectors, and immigration inspectors while traveling on official business, witnesses attending any legal investigation in which the carrier is interested, persons injured in accidents and physicians and nurses attending such persons: Provided, That this provision shall not be construed to prohibit the interchange of passes for the officers, agents, and employees of carriers and their families, nor to prohibit any carrier from carrying passengers free with the object of providing relief in cases of general epidemic, pestilence, or other calamitous visitation. Any carrier violating this provision shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and for each offense on conviction shall pay to the United States a penalty of not less than $100 nor more than $2,000, and any person, other than the person excepted in this provision, who uses any such interstate free ticket, free pass, or free transportation shall be subject to a like penalty.

"(d) On and after the approval of this act any person or persons who shall knowingly and willfully, by physical force or intimidation by threats of physical force, obstruct or retard, or aid in obstructing or retarding, the orderly conduct or movement in the United States of interstate air commerce, or the orderly movement of any aircraft or any air line, or elsewhere in the United States engaged in interstate air commerce, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and for every such offense shall be punishable by a fine of not exceeding $100 or by imprisonment for not exceeding 6 months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"(e) If any carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, by any special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device, charge, demand, collect, or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for any service rendered, or to be rendered, in the transportation of passengers or property, subject to the provisions of this act, than it charges, demands, collects, or receives from any other person or persons for doing for him or them a like and contemporaneous service in the transportation of a like kind of traffic under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, such carrier shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

"(f) It shall be unlawful for any carrier subject to the provisions of this act to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever.

"(g) Every carrier subject to this act shall file with the commission copies of all contracts, agreements, or arrangements with other carriers in relation to any traffic affected by the provisions of this act to which it may be a party.

"(h) That in time of war or threatened war preference and precedence shall, upon demand of the President of the United States, be given over all other traffic for the transportation of troops and materials of war, and carriers shall adopt every means within their control to facilitate and expedite the military traffic. And in time of peace shipments consigned to agents of the United States for its use shall be delivered by the carriers as promptly as possible and without regard to any embargo that may have been declared, and no such embargo shall apply to shipments so consigned.

"(i) In case of failure or refusal on the part of any carrier, receiver, or trustee to comply with the terms of any regulation adopted and promulgated or any order made by the commission under the provisions of this section, such carrier, receiver, or trustee shall be liable to a penalty of $500 for such offense, and $25 for each and every day of the continuance of such offense, which shall accrue to the United States and may be recovered in a civil action brought by the United States.

"(j) That any person or persons claiming to be damaged by any carrier subject to the provisions of this act may either make complaint to the commission as hereinafter provided for, or may bring suit in his or their own behalf for the recovery of the damages for which such carrier may be liable under the provisions of this act, in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, but such person or persons shall not have the right to pursue both of said remedies, and must in each case elect which one of the two methods of procedure herein provided for he or they will adopt. In any such action brought for the recovery of damages, the court before which the same shall be pending may compel any director, officer, receiver, trustee, or agent of the corporation or company defendant in such suit to attend, appear, and testify in such case, and may compel the production of the books and papers of such corporation or company party to any such suit; the claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such witness from testifying, but such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding.

"VALUATION OF CARRIER PROPERTIES

"SEC. 8. (a) The commission may from time to time, as may be necessary for the proper administration of this act, make a valuation of all or of any part of the property owned or used by any carrier subject to this act, which is used and useful in interstate air commerce, as of such date as the commission may fix.

"(b) The commission may at any time require any such carrier to file with the commission an inventory of all or of any part of the property owned or used by said carrier, which is used and useful in interstate air commerce, which inventory shall show the property classified in such detail, and in such manner, as the commission shall direct, and shall show the estimated cost of reproduction new of said property, and its reproduction cost new less depreciation, as of such date as the commission may direct; and such carrier shall file such inventory within such reasonable time as the commission by order shall require.

"(c) The commission may at any time require any such carrier to file with the commission a statement showing the original cost of all or of any part of the property owned or used by said carrier, which is used and useful in interstate air commerce. For the showing of such original cost said property shall be classified, and the original cost shall be defined, in such manner as the commission may prescribe; and if any part of such cost cannot be determined from accounting or other records, the portion of the property for which such cost cannot be determined shall be reported to the commission; and, if the commission shall so direct, the original cost thereof shall be estimated in such manner as the commission may prescribe. If the carrier owning the property at the time such original cost is reported shall have paid more or less than the original cost to acquire the same, the amount of such cost of acquisition, and any facts which the commission may require in connection therewith, shall be reported with such original cost. The report made by a carrier under this paragraph shall show the source or sources from which the original cost reported was obtained, and such other information as to the manner in which the report was prepared, as the commission shall require.

"(d) Nothing shall be included in the original cost reported for the property of any carrier under paragraph (c) of this section on account of any easement, license, or franchise granted by the United States or by any State or political subdivision thereof, beyond the reasonable necessary expense lawfully incurred in obtaining such easement, license, or franchise from the public authority aforesaid, which expense shall be reported separately from all other costs in such detail as the commission may require; and nothing shall be included in any valuation of the property of any carrier made by the commission on account of any such easement, license, or franchise, beyond such reasonable necessary expense lawfully incurred as aforesaid.

"(e) For the purpose of enabling the commission to make a valuation of any of the property of any such carrier, or to find the original cost of such property, or to find any other facts concerning the same which are required for use by the commission, the commission may exercise all necessary powers and authority, and it shall be the duty of each such carrier to furnish to the commission, within such reasonable time as the commission may order, any information with respect thereto which the commission may by order require, including copies of maps, contracts, reports of engineers, and other data, records, and papers. The commission, in making any such valuation shall be free to adopt any method of valuation which shall be lawful.

"ACCOUNTS, RECORDS, AND MEMORANDA; DEPRECIATION CHARGES

"SEC. 9. (a) The commission may, in its discretion, prescribe the forms of any and all accounts, records, and memoranda to be kept by carriers subject to the provisions of this act, including the accounts, records, and memoranda of the movement of traffic, as well as of the receipts and expenditures of moneys.

"(b) The commission shall, as soon as practicable, prescribe, for carriers subject to this act, the classes of property for which depreciation charges may properly be included under operating expenses, and the percentages of depreciation which shall be charged with respect to each of such classes of property, classifying the carriers as it may deem proper for this purpose. The commission may, when it deems necessary, modify the classes and percentages so prescribed. The carriers subject to this act shall not charge to operating expenses any depreciation charges on classes of property other than those prescribed by the commission, or charge with respect to any class of property a percentage of depreciation other than that prescribed therefor by the commission. No such carrier shall in any case include in any form under its operating or other expenses any depreciation or other charge or expenditure included elsewhere as a depreciation charge or otherwise under its operating or other expenses.

"(c) The commission shall at all times have access to all accounts, records, and memoranda, including all documents, papers, and correspondence now or hereafter existing, and kept or required to be kept by carriers subject to this act, and the provisions of this section respecting the preservation and destruction of books, papers, and documents shall apply thereto, and it shall be unlawful for such carriers to keep any other accounts, records, or memoranda than those prescribed or approved by the commission, and it may employ special agents or examiners, who shall have authority under the order of the commission to inspect and examine any and all accounts, records, and memoranda, including all documents, papers, and correspondence now or hereafter existing, and kept or required to be kept by such carriers. This provision shall apply to receivers of carriers and operating trustees.

"(d) In case of failure or refusal on the part of any such carrier, receiver, or trustee to keep such accounts, records, and memoranda on the books and in the manner prescribed by the commission, or to submit such accounts, records, and memoranda as are kept to the inspection of the commission or any of its authorized agents or examiners, such carrier, receiver, or trustee shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $500 for each such offense and for each and every day of the continuance of such offense, such forfeitures to be recoverable in the same manner as other forfeitures provided for in this act.

"(e) Any person who shall willfully make any false entry in the accounts of any book of accounts or in any record or memoranda kept by a carrier, or who shall willfully destroy, mutilate, alter, or by any other means or device falsify the record of any such account, record, or memoranda of all facts and transactions appertaining to the carrier's business, or shall keep any other accounts, records, or memoranda than those prescribed or approved by the commission, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be subject, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, to a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 or imprisonment for a term of not less than 1 year nor more than 3 years, or both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That the commission may in its discretion issue orders specifying such operating, accounting, or financial papers, records, books, blanks, tickets, stubs, or documents of carriers which may, after a reasonable time, be destroyed, and prescribing the length of time such books, papers, or documents shall be preserved.

"(f) Any examiner who divulges any fact or information which may come to his knowledge during the course of such examination, except insofar as he may be directed by the commission or by a court or judge thereof, shall be subject, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, to a fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment for a term not exceeding 2 years, or both.

"COMMISSION AUTHORIZED TO PRESCRIBE JUST AND REASONABLE RATES

"SEC. 10 (a) The commission is hereby empowered and directed as soon as practicable to fix and determine from time to time the fair and reasonable rates and compensation for the transportation of passengers, mail, and property by aircraft, and the service connected therewith, and to publish the same, and orders so made and published shall continue in force until changed by the commission after due notice and hearing.

"(b) The commission may fix different rates for different routes and from time to time revise the same in such manner as at all times to return a fair and just compensation to the carrier operating said route or routes, and as may be necessary to maintain and insure necessary and adequate transportation of passengers, mail, and property, and all services incident thereto.

"(c) Pending the determination by the commission of fair and reasonable rates, the rate for the transportation of mail by aircraft and the services connected therewith shall be as follows: First 50 pounds of average load per mile at 5 mills per pound; second 50 pounds of average load per mile at 3 mills per pound; third 50 pounds of average load per mile at 1 mill per pound; and all over 150 pounds of average load per mile at one half mill per pound: Provided, however, That in no event shall a carrier receive more than 50 cents per pound-mile.

"(d) Pending the determination of fair and reasonable rates applicable to the transportation by air of passengers and property, the rates which may be charged shall be those in force and effect on the date of passage of this act.

"HEARING AS TO LAWFULNESS OF NEW CHARGES AND SUSPENSION

"SEC. 11. (a) Whenever there shall be filed with the commission any schedule stating a new rate, fare, or charge, or any new classification, or any new regulation or practice affecting any rate, fare, or charge, the commission shall have, and it is hereby given, authority, either upon complaint or upon its own initiative without complaint, at once, and if it so orders without answer or other formal pleading by the interested carrier but upon reasonable notice, to enter upon a hearing concerning the lawfulness of such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice; and pending such hearing and the decision thereon the commission, upon filing with such schedule and delivering to the carrier affected thereby a statement in writing of its reasons for such suspension, may from time to time suspend the operation of such schedule and defer the use of such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice, but not for a longer period than 7 months beyond the time when it would otherwise go into effect; and after full hearing, whether completed before or after the rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice goes into effect, the commission may make such order with reference thereto as would be proper in a proceeding initiated after it had become effective. If the proceeding has not been concluded and an order made within the period of suspension, the proposed change of rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice shall go into effect at the end of such period; but in case of a proposed increased rate or charge for or in respect to the transportation of property, the commission may by order require the interested carrier to keep accurate account in detail of all amounts received by reason of such increase, specifying by whom and in whose behalf such amounts are paid, and upon completion of the hearing and decision may by further order require the interested carrier to refund, with interest, to the persons in whose behalf such amounts were paid, such portion of such increased rates or charges as by its decision shall be found not justified. At any hearing involving a rate, fare, or charge sought to be increased after the passage of this act, the burden of proof to show that the increased rate, fare, or charge, or proposed increased rate, fare, or charge, is just and reasonable shall be upon the carrier, and the commission shall give to the hearing and decision of such questions preference over all other questions pending before it and decide the same as speedily as possible.

"(b) The foregoing numeration of powers shall not exclude any power which the commission would otherwise have in the making of an order under the provisions of this act.

"COMPLAINTS AND INVESTIGATIONS

"SEC. 12 (a) Any person, firm, corporation, company, or association, or any mercantile, agricultural, or manufacturing society or other organization, or any body politic or municipal organization, or any carrier, complaining of anything done or omitted to be done by any carrier subject to the provisions of this act, in contravention of the provisions thereof, may apply to said commission by petition, which shall briefly state the facts; whereupon a statement of the complaint thus made shall be forwarded by the commission to such carrier, who shall be called upon to satisfy the complaint, or to answer the same in writing, within a reasonable time, to be specified by the commission. If such carrier within the time specified shall make reparation for the injury alleged to have been done, the carrier shall be relieved of liability to the complainant only for the particular violation of law thus complained of. If such carrier or carriers shall not satisfy the complaint within the time specified, or there shall appear to be any reasonable ground for investigating said complaint, it shall be the duty of the commission to investigate the matters complained of in such manner and by such means as it shall deem proper.

"(b) Said commission shall, in like manner and with the same authority and powers, investigate any complaint forwarded by the aviation commissioner or aviation commission of any State or Territory at the request of such commissioner or commission, and the Federal Aviation Commission shall have full authority and power at any time to institute an inquiry, on its own motion, in any case and as to any matter or thing concerning which a complaint is authorized to be made, to or before said commission by any provision of this act, or concerning which any question may arise under any of the provisions of this act, or relating to the enforcement of any of the provisions of this act. And the said commission shall have the same powers and authority to proceed with any inquiry instituted on its own motion as though it had been appealed to by complaint or petition under any of the provisions of this act, including the power to make and enforce any order or orders in the case, or relating to the matter or thing concerning which the inquiry is had excepting orders for the payment of money. No complaint shall at any time be dismissed because of the absence of direct damage to the complainant.

"(c) Whenever an investigation shall be made by the commission, it shall be its duty to make a report in writing in respect thereto, which shall state the conclusions of the commission, together with its decision, order, or requirement in the premises; and in case damages are awarded such report shall include the findings of fact on which the award is made.

"(d) All reports of investigations made by the commission shall be entered of record, and a copy thereof shall be furnished to the party who may have complained, and to any carrier that may have been complained of.

"(e) The commission may provide for the publication of its reports and decisions in such form and manner as may be best adapted for public information and use, and such authorized publications shall be competent evidence of the reports and decisions of the commission therein contained in all courts of the United States and of the several States without any further proof or authentication thereof. The commission may also cause to be printed for early distribution its annual reports.

"CONSOLIDATIONS, EXTENSIONS, AND ABANDONMENT

"SEC. 13. (a) After 90 days after this act takes effect no carrier subject to this act shall undertake the extension of its airline, or the construction of a new airline, or shall acquire through consolidation, reorganization, merger, or otherwise, or operate any airline, or extension thereof, or shall engage in interstate air commerce under this act over or by means of such additional or extended airline unless and until there shall first have been obtained from the commission a certificate that the present or future public convenience and necessity require or will require the construction, or operation, or construction and operation, of such additional or extended airline, and no carrier subject to this act shall abandon all or any portion of any airline, or the operation thereof, unless and until there shall first have been obtained from the commission a certificate that the present or future public convenience and necessity permit of such abandonment.

"(b) The application for and issuance of any such certificate shall be under such rules and regulations as to hearings and other matters as the commission may from time to time prescribe, and the provisions of this act shall apply to all such proceedings. Upon receipt of any application for such certificate the commission shall cause notice thereof to be given to and a copy filed with the Governor of each State in which such additional or extended line of airline is proposed to be constructed or operated, or all or any portion of an airline, or the operation thereof, is proposed to be abandoned, with the right to be heard as herein provided with respect to the hearing of complaints or the issuance of securities.

"(c) The commission shall have power to issue such certificate as prayed for, or to refuse to issue it, or to issue it for a portion or portions of an airline, or extension thereof, described in the application, or for the partial exercise only of such right or privilege, and may attach to the issuance of the certificate such terms and conditions as in its judgment the public convenience and necessity may require. From and after issuance of such certificate, and not before, the carrier may, without securing approval other than such certificate, comply with the terms and conditions contained in or attached to the issuance of such certificate and proceed with the construction, operation, or abandonment covered thereby. Any construction, operation, or abandonment contrary to the provisions of this act may be enjoined by any court of competent jurisdiction at the suit of the United States, the commission, any commission or regulating body of the State or States affected, or any party in interest; and any carrier which, or any director, officer, receiver, operating trustee, lessee, agent, or person, acting for or employed by such carrier, who knowingly authorizes, consents to, or permits any violation of any of the provisions of this section shall upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 3 years, or both.

"(d) The commission may, after hearing, in a proceeding upon complaint or upon its own initiative without complaint, authorize or require by order any carrier subject to this act, party to such proceeding, to provide itself with safe and adequate facilities for performing as a carrier, and to extend its line or lines: Provided, That no such authorization or order shall be made unless the commission finds, as to such extension, that it is reasonably required in the interest of public convenience and necessity, or as to such extension or facilities that the expense involved therein will not impair the ability of the carrier to perform its duty to the public. Any carrier subject to this act which refuses or neglects to comply with any order of the commission made in pursuance of this paragraph shall be liable to a penalty of $100 for each day during which such refusal or neglect continues, which shall accrue to the United States and may be recovered in a civil action brought by the United States.

"(e) Whenever the commission is of opinion, after hearing, on application of any carrier or carriers engaged in the transportation of passengers or property subject to this act, that the acquisition, to the extent indicated by the commission, by one of such carriers of the control of any other such carrier or carriers either under a lease or by the purchase of stock or in any other manner not involving the consolidation of such carriers into a single system for ownership and operation, will be in the public interest, the commission shall have authority by order to approve and authorize such acquisition, under such rules and regulations and for such consideration and on such terms and conditions as shall be found by the commission to be just and reasonable in the premises.

"(f) It shall be lawful for two or more carriers, subject to this act, to consolidate their properties or any part thereof into one corporation for the ownership, management, and operation of the properties theretofore in separate ownership, management, and operation, under the following conditions:

"(1) The proposed consolidation must be in harmony with and in furtherance of a plan of consolidation approved by the commission;

"(2) The bonds at par of the corporation which is to become the owner of the consolidated properties, together with the outstanding capital stock of such corporation, shall not exceed the value of the consolidated properties as determined by the commission. The value of the properties sought to be consolidated shall be ascertained by the commission and it shall be the duty of the commission to proceed immediately to the ascertainment of such value for the properties involved in a proposed consolidation upon the filing of the application for such consolidation.

"(3) Whenever two or more carriers propose a consolidation under this section, they shall present their application therefor to the commission, and thereupon the commission shall notify the governor of each State in which any part of the properties sought to be consolidated is situated and the carriers involved in the proposed consolidation of the time and place for a public hearing. If after such hearing the commission finds that the public interest will be promoted by the consolidation and that the conditions of this section have been or will be fulfilled, it may enter an order approving and authorizing such consolidation, with such modifications and upon such terms and conditions as it may prescribe, and thereupon such consolidation may be effected, in accordance with such order, if all the carriers involved assent thereto, the law of any State or the decision or order of any State authority to the contrary notwithstanding.

"(g) The carriers affected by any order made under the foregoing provisions of this section and any corporation organized to effect a consolidation approved and authorized in such order shall be, and they are hereby, relieved from the operation of the 'antitrust laws', as designated in section 1 of the act entitled 'An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes', approved October 15, 1913, and of all other restraints or prohibitions by law, State or Federal, insofar as may be necessary to enable them to do anything authorized or required by any order made under and pursuant to the foregoing provisions of this section.

"AUTHORIZATION FOR SECURITIES AND INDEBTEDNESS

"SEC. 14. (a) From and after 120 days after this section takes effect it shall be unlawful for any carrier to issue any share of capital stock or any bond or other evidence of interest in or indebtedness of the carrier (hereinafter in this section collectively termed 'securities') or to assume any obligation or liability as lessor, lessee, guarantor, endorser, surety, or otherwise, in respect of the securities of any other person, natural or artificial, even though permitted by the authority creating the carrier corporation, unless and until, and then only to the extent that, upon application by the carrier, and after investigation by the commission of the purposes and uses of the proposed issue and the proceeds thereof, of the proposed assumption of obligation or liability in respect of the securities of any other person, natural or artificial, the commission by order authorizes such issue or assumption. The commission shall make such order only if it finds that such issue or assumption: Is for some lawful object within its corporate purposes, and compatible with the public interest, which is necessary or appropriate for or consistent with the proper performance by the carrier of service to the public as a common carrier, and which will not impair its ability to perform that service; and is reasonably necessary and appropriate for such purpose.

"(b) The commission shall have power by its order to grant or deny the application as made, or to grant it in part and deny it in part, or to grant it with such modifications and upon such terms and conditions as the commission may deem necessary or appropriate, and may by any such supplemental order modify the provisions of any previous order as to the particular purposes, uses, and extent to which, or the conditions under which, any securities so theretofore authorized or the proceeds thereof may be applied.

"(c) Every application for authority shall be made in such form and contain such matters as the commission may prescribe. Every such application, as also every certificate of notification hereinafter provided for, shall be made under oath, signed, and filed on behalf of the carrier by its president, a vice president, auditor, comptroller, or other executive officer having knowledge of the matters therein set forth and duly designated for that purpose by the carrier.

"(d) Whenever any securities set forth and described in any application for authority or certificate of notification as pledged or held unencumbered in the treasury of the carrier, shall, subsequent to the filing of such application or certificate, be sold, pledged, repledged, or otherwise disposed of by the carrier, such carrier shall, within 10 days after such sale, pledge, repledge, or other disposition, file with the commission a certificate of notification to that effect, setting forth therein all such facts as may be required by the commission.

"(e) The jurisdiction conferred upon the commission by this section shall be exclusive and plenary, and a carrier may issue securities and assume obligations or liabilities in accordance with the provisions of this section without securing approval other than as specified herein.

"(f) Nothing herein shall be construed to imply any guaranty or obligation as to such securities on the part of the United States.

"(g) The foregoing provisions of this section shall not apply to notes to be issued by the carrier maturing not more than 2 years after the date thereof and aggregating (together with all other then outstanding notes of a maturity of 2 years or less) not more than 5 percent of the book value of the securities of the carrier then outstanding. Within 10 days after the making of such notes the carrier issuing the same shall file with the commission a certificate of notification, in such form as may from time to time be determined and prescribed by the commission, setting forth as nearly as may be the same matters as those required in respect of applications for authority to issue other securities: Provided, That in any subsequent funding of such notes the provisions of this section respecting other securities shall apply.

"(h) The commission shall require periodical or special reports from each carrier hereafter issuing any securities, including such notes, which shall show, in such detail as the commission may require, the disposition made of such securities and the application of the proceeds thereof.

"(i) Any security issued or any obligation or liability assumed by a carrier, for which under the provisions of this section the authorization of the commission is required, shall be void, if issued or assumed without such authorization therefor having first been obtained, or if issued or assumed contrary to any term or condition of such order of authorization as modified by any order supplemental thereto entered prior to such issuance or assumption; but no security issued or obligation or liability assumed in accordance with all the terms and conditions of such an order of authorization therefor as modified by any order supplemental thereto entered prior to such issuance or assumption, shall be rendered void because of failure to comply with any provisions of this section relating to procedure and other matters preceding the entry of such order of authorization. If any security so made void, or any security in respect to which the assumption of obligation or liability is so made void, is acquired by any person for value and in good faith and without notice that the issue or assumption is void, such person may in a suit or action in any court of competent jurisdiction hold jointly and severally liable for the full amount of the damage sustained by him in respect thereof the carrier which issued the security so made void, or assumed the obligation or liability so made void, and its directors, officers, attorneys, and other agents, who participated in any way in the authorizing, issuing, hypothecating, or selling of the security so made void or in the authorizing of the assumption of the obligation or liability so made void. In case any security so made void was directly acquired from the carrier issuing it, the holder may at his option rescind the transaction and upon the surrender of the security recover the consideration given thereof. Any director, officer, attorney, or agent of the carrier who knowingly assents to or concurs in any issue of securities or assumptions of obligation or liability forbidden by this section, or any sale or other disposition of securities contrary to the provisions of the commission's order or orders in the premises, or any application not authorized by the commission of the funds derived by the carrier through such sale or other disposition of such securities shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for not less than 1 year nor more than 3 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

"ORDER FOR PAYMENT OF MONEY

"SEC. 15. That if, after hearing on a complaint made as provided in this act, the commission shall determine that any party complainant is entitled to an award of damages under the provisions of this act for a violation thereof, the commission shall make an order directing the carrier to pay to the complainant the sum to which he is entitled on or before the day named.

"PROVISIONS RELATING TO ORDERS

"SEC. 16. (a) Every order of the commission shall be forthwith served upon the designated agent of the carrier in the city of Washington or in such other manner as may be provided by law.

"(b) The commission shall be authorized to suspend or modify its orders upon such notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper.

"(c) It shall be the duty of every carrier, its agents, and employees, to observe and comply with such orders so long as the same shall remain in effect.

"REHEARING BEFORE COMMISSION

"SEC. 17. After a decision, order, or requirement has been made by the commission in any proceeding any party thereto may at any time make application for rehearing of the same, or any matter determine therein, and it shall be lawful for the commission in its discretion to grant such a rehearing if sufficient reason therefor be made to appear. Applications for rehearing shall be governed by such general rules as the commission may establish. No such application shall excuse any carrier from complying with or obeying any decision, order, or requirement of the commission, or operate in any manner to stay or postpone the enforcement thereof, without the special order of the commission. In case a rehearing is granted, the proceedings thereupon shall conform as nearly as may be to the proceedings in an original hearing, except as the commission may otherwise direct; and if, in its judgment, after such rehearing and the consideration of all facts, including those arising since the former hearing, it shall appear that the original decision, order, or requirement is in any respect unjust or unwarranted, the commission may reverse, change, or modify the same accordingly. Any decision, order, or requirement made after such rehearing, reversing, changing, or modifying the original determination shall be subject to the same provisions as an original order.

"INTERLOCKING DIRECTORS—OFFICIALS DEALING IN SECURITIES

"SEC. 18. (a) After December 31, 1934, it shall be unlawful for any person to hold the position of officer or director of more than one carrier, unless such holding shall have been authorized by order of the commission, upon due showing in form and manner prescribed by the commission, that neither public nor private interests will be adversely affected thereby.

"(b) After this act takes effect it shall be unlawful for any officer or director of any carrier to receive for his own benefit, directly or indirectly, any money or thing of value in respect of the negotiation, hypothecation, or sale of any securities issued or to be issued by such carrier, or to share in any of the proceeds thereof, or to participate in the making or paying of any dividends of an operating carrier from any funds properly included in capital account.

"(c) Any violation of the provisions shall be a misdemeanor, and on conviction in any United States court having jurisdiction shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for not less than 1 year nor more than 3 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

"INQUIRIES INTO MANAGEMENT

"SEC. 19. The commission hereby created shall have authority to inquire into the management of the business of all carriers subject to the provisions of this act, shall keep itself informed as to the manner and method in which the same is conducted, and shall have the right to obtain from such carriers full and complete information necessary to enable the commission to perform the duties and carry out the objects for which it was created.

"JURISDICTION TO ENFORCE ACT

"SEC. 20. (a) The commission is hereby authorized and required to execute and enforce the provisions of this act; and, upon the request of the commission, it shall be the duty of any district attorney of the United States to whom the commission may apply to institute in the proper court and to prosecute under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States all necessary proceedings for the enforcement of the provisions of this act, and for the punishment of all violations thereof, and the costs and expenses of such prosecution shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States; and for the purposes of this act the commission shall have power to require, by subpena, the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter under investigation.

"(b) Such attendance of witnesses, and the production of such documentary evidence, may be required from any place in the United States, at any designated place or hearing. And in case of disobedience to a subpena, the commission, or any party to a proceeding before the commission, may invoke the aid of any court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents under the provisions of this section.

"(c) Any of the district courts of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpena issued to any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or other person, issue an order requiring such carrier or other person to appear before said commission (and produce books and papers if so ordered) and give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. The claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such witness from testifying; but such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding.

"(d) The testimony of any witness may be taken, at the instance of a party, in any proceeding or investigation pending before the commission, by deposition, at any time after a cause or proceeding is at issue on petition and answer. The commission may also order testimony to be taken by deposition in any proceeding or investigation pending before it, at any stage of such proceeding or investigation. Such depositions may be taken before any judge of any court of the United States, or any commissioner of a circuit, or any clerk of a district or circuit court, or any chancellor, justice, or judge of a supreme or superior court, mayor or chief magistrate of a city, judge of a county court, or court of common pleas of any of the United States, or any notary public, not being of counsel or attorney to either of the parties, nor interested in the event of the proceeding or investigation. Reasonable notice must first be given in writing by the party or his attorney proposing to take such deposition to the opposite party or his attorney of record, as either may be nearest, which notice shall state the name of the witness and the time and place of the taking of his deposition. Any person may be compelled to appear and testify and produce documentary evidence before the commission as hereinbefore provided.

"(e) Every person deposing as herein provided shall be cautioned and sworn (or affirm, if he so request) to testify the whole truth, and shall be carefully examined. His testimony shall be reduced to writing by the magistrate taking the deposition, or under his direction, and shall, after it has been reduced to writing, be subscribed by the deponent.

"(f) If a witness whose testimony may be desired to be taken by deposition be in a foreign country, the deposition may be taken before an officer or person designated by the commission, or agreed upon by the parties by stipulation in writing to be filed with the commission. All depositions must be properly filed with the commission.

"(g) Witnesses whose depositions are taken pursuant to this act, and the magistrate or other officer taking the same, shall severally be entitled to the same fees as are paid for like services in courts of the United States.

"LIMITATIONS AS TO ACTIONS

"SEC. 21. (a) All actions at law by carriers subject to this act for recovery of their charges, or any part thereof, shall be begun within 3 years from the time the cause of action accrues.

"(b) All complaints against carriers subject to this act for the recovery of damages not based on overcharges shall be filed with the commission within 2 years from the time the cause of action accrues.

"(c) For recovery of overcharges, action at law shall be begun or complaint filed with the commission against carriers subject to this act within 3 years from the time the cause of action accrues, except that, if claim for the overcharge has been presented in writing to the carrier within the 3-year period of limitation, said period shall be extended to include 6 months from the time notice in writing is given by the carrier to the claimant of disallowance of the claim, or any part or parts thereof, specified in the notice.

"(d) If on or before expiration of the 2-year period of limitation in subdivision (b) or of the 3-year period of limitation in subdivision (c) a carrier subject to this act begins action under subdivision (a) for recovery of charges in respect of the same transportation service, or, without beginning action, collects charges in respect of that service, said period of limitation shall be extended to include 90 days from the time such action is begun or such charges are collected by the carrier.

"(e) The cause of action in respect of a shipment of property shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to accrue upon delivery or tender of delivery thereof by the carrier, and not after.

"(f) A petition for the enforcement of an order of the commission or the payment of money shall be filed in the district court or the State court within 1 year from the date of the order, and not after.

"(g) The term 'overcharges' as used in this section shall be deemed to mean charges for transportation services in excess of those applicable thereto under the tariffs in effect.

"TITLE IV

"PENAL PROVISIONS

"SEC. 22. (a) That any carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or whenever such carrier is a corporation, any director or officer thereof, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by such corporation, who, alone or with any other corporation, company, person, or party, shall willfully do or cause to be done, or shall willingly suffer or permit to be done, any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or declared to be unlawful, or who shall aid or abet therein, or shall willfully omit or fail to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or shall cause or willingly suffer or permit any act, matter, or thing so directed or required by this act to be done not to be so done, or shall aid or abet any such omission or failure, or shall be guilty of any infraction of this act for which no penalty is otherwise provided, or who shall aid or abet therein, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof in any district court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such offense was committed, be subject to a fine of not to exceed $5,000 for each offense: Provided, That if the offense for which any person shall be convicted as aforesaid shall be an unlawful discrimination in rates, fares, or charges for the transportation of passengers or property, or the transmission of intelligence, such person shall, in addition to the fine hereinbefore provided for, be liable to imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not exceeding 2 years, or both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

"(b) Any carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or, whenever such carrier is a corporation, any officer or agent thereof, or any person acting for or employed by such corporation, who, by means of false billings, false classification, false weighing, or false report of weight, or by any other device or means, shall knowingly and willfully assist, or shall willingly suffer or permit, any person or persons to obtain transportation for property at less than the regular rates then established and in force on the line of transportation of such carrier, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof in any district court of the United States within the district in which such offense was committed, be subject to a fine of not exceeding $5,000, or imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not exceeding 2 years, or both, in the discretion of the court, for each offense.

"(c) Any person, corporation, or company, or any agent or officer thereof, who shall deliver property for transportation to any carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or for whom, as consignor or consignee, any such carrier shall transport property, who shall knowingly and willfully, directly or indirectly, himself or by employee, agent, officer, or otherwise, by false billing, false classification, false weighing, false representation of the contents of the package or the substance of the property, false report of weight, false statement, or by any other device or means, whether with or without the consent or connivance of the carrier, its agent, or officers, obtain or attempt to obtain transportation for such property at less than the regular rates then established and in force on the line of transportation; or who shall knowingly and willfully, directly or indirectly, himself or by employee, agent, officer, or otherwise, by false statement or representation as to cost, value, nature, or extent of injury, or by the use of any false bill, bill of lading, receipt, voucher, roll, account, claim, certificate, affidavit, or deposition, knowing the same to be false, fictitious, or fraudulent, or to contain any false, fictitious, or fraudulent statement or entry, obtain or attempt to obtain any allowance, refund, or payment for damage or otherwise in connection with or growing out of the transportation of or agreement to transport such property, whether with or without the consent or connivance of the carrier, whereby the compensation of such carrier for such transportation, either before or after payment, shall in fact be made less than the regular rates then established and in force on the line of transportation, shall be deemed guilty of fraud, which is hereby declared to be a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof in any district court of the United States within the district in which such offense was wholly or in part committed, be subject for each offense to a fine of not exceeding $5,000, or imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not exceeding 2 years, or both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That the penalty of imprisonment shall not apply to artificial persons.

"(d) If any such person, or any officer or agent of any such corporation or company, shall, by payment of money or other thing of value, solicitation, or otherwise, induce or attempt to induce any carrier subject to the provisions of this act, or any of its officers or agents, to discriminate unjustly in his, its, or their favor as against any other consignor or consignee in the transportation of property, or shall aid or abet any carrier in any such unjust discrimination, such person or such officer or agent of such corporation or company shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof in any district court of the United States within the district in which such offense was committed, be subject to a fine of not exceeding $5,000, or imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not exceeding 2 years, or both, in the discretion of the court, for each offense; and such person, corporation, or company shall also, together with said carrier, be liable, jointly or severally, in an action to be brought by any consignor or consignee discriminated against in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction for all damages caused by or resulting therefrom.

"PROVISIONS RELATING TO FORFEITURES AND FINES

"SEC. 23 (a) The forfeiture provided for in this act shall be payable into the Treasury of the United States, and shall be recoverable in a civil suit in the name of the United States, brought in the district where the carrier has its principal operating office, or in any district through which the road of the carrier runs.

"(b) It shall be the duty of the various district attorneys, under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States, to prosecute for the recovery of forfeitures. The costs and expenses of such prosecution shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States.

"TITLE V—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

"ANNUAL AND OTHER REPORTS

"SEC. 24. (a) That the commission is hereby authorized to require annual reports from all carriers subject to the provisions of this act, and from the owners of all carriers engaged in interstate air commerce as defined in this act, to prescribe the manner in which such reports shall be made, and to require from such carriers specific answers to all questions upon which the commission may need information. Such annual reports shall show in detail the amount of capital stock issued, the amounts paid therefor, and the manner of payment for the same; the dividends paid, the surplus fund, if any, and the number of stockholders; the funded and floating debts and the interest paid thereon; the cost and value of the carrier's property, franchises, and equipment; the number of employees and the salaries paid each class; the amounts expended for improvements each year, how expended, and the character of such improvements, the earnings and receipts from each branch of business and from all sources; the operating and other expenses; the balances of profit and loss; and a complete exhibit of the financial operations of the carrier each year, including an annual balance sheet. Such reports shall also contain such information in relation to rates or regulations concerning fares, or cargo, or agreements, arrangements, or contracts affecting the same as the commission may require; and the commission may, in its discretion, for the purpose of enabling it the better to carry out the purposes of this act, prescribe a period of time within which all carriers subject to the provisions of this act shall have, as near as may be, a uniform system of accounts, and the manner in which such accounts shall be kept.

"(b) Said detailed reports shall contain all the required statistics for the period of 12 months ending on the 30th day of June in each year, or on the 31st day of December in each year if the commission by order substitute that period for the year ending June 30, and shall be made out under oath and filed with the commission at its office in Washington within 3 months after the close of the year for which the report is made, unless additional time be granted in any case by the commission; and if any carrier, person, or corporation subject to the provisions of this act shall fail to make and file said annual reports within the time above specified, or within the time extended by the commission, for making and filing the same, or shall fail to make specific answer to any question authorized by the provisions of this section within 30 days from the time it is lawfully required so to do, such party shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $100 for each and every day it shall continue to be in default with respect thereto. The commission shall also have authority by general or special orders to require said carriers, or any of them, to file monthly reports of earnings and expenses, and to file periodical or special, or both periodical and special, reports concerning any matters about which the commission is authorized or required by this or any other law to inquire or to keep itself informed or which it is required to enforce; and such periodical or special reports shall be under oath whenever the commission so requires; and if any such carrier shall fail to make and file any such periodical or special report within the time fixed by the commission, it shall be subject to the forfeitures last above provided.

"(c) Said forfeitures shall be recovered in the manner provided for the recovery of forfeitures under the provisions of this act.

"(d) The oath required by this section may be taken before any person authorized to administer an oath by the laws of the State in which the same is taken.

"SEPARABILITY CLAUSE

"SEC. 27. If any provisions of this act or the application thereof to any class of persons or circumstances is held invalid, such invalidity shall not be held to affect the remainder of the act or the application of such provisions to other persons or circumstances.

"SHORT TITLE

"SEC. 29. That this act may be cited as the Federal Aviation Act."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to revise air-mail laws, to provide for the regulation of interstate transportation of passengers, mail, and property by aircraft within the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, it is not necessary to draw to the attention of the Senate the fact that for nearly a year a special committee of the Senate has been investigating this subject. It is not necessary to draw to the attention of the Senate the fact that today four members of that committee, I think I may be justified in saying, are now presenting this amendment as a substitute for the pending measure. When I say "four members of that committee" I hope I do not transgress the rule, because I believe that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], together with myself, will support by our votes the amendment in the nature of a substitute which I am now offering. If I am wrong as to that, I desire to be corrected at this time.

Mr. President, what gave rise to this proposed legislation which I am offering by way of a substitute to the pending bill? An investigation that disclosed conditions whereby and by reason of which there were contending forces in the committee and whereby we found that conditions in the law as it now exists should be remedied. Then came another condition, the order of the Postmaster General canceling all outstanding air-mail contracts, leaving the entire matter of the transportation of the mail by air "up in the air", to use the common vernacular of the street, with no one to carry the air mail. Then the question arose, Should we restore the contracts or should we enact a law whereby the greatest good might come out of all this investigation?

Mr. President, the investigation has borne fruit and will continue to bear fruit for the future welfare of the country; it will at least bear fruit so that we will draw our legislation with greater care, and, moreover, we hope that our public officials will execute the law with greater particularity. But, Mr. President, we cannot and we should not tear down. We can, we should, we must build up. The bill now pending before this body will only open an avenue for the very conditions which were found on investigation to exist. It is going from one cesspool into another, if I may use that homely expression. Today it is proposed by the pending legislation to put the whole matter back in the Post Office Department, to put the whole matter back in the hands and control of the Postmaster General. I do not care whether the Postmaster General is a Democrat or a Republican.

My thought has come out of careful consideration of the investigation through which I have gone with one of the most able men with whom I ever worked, and my conclusions have come that the whole matter should be taken out of politics, that it should be taken out of a department, and that it should be put under the jurisdiction of an independent, nonpartisan commission to control, supervise, and regulate.

Moreover, I believe we should not tear down the progress made in the past, whereby great lines today are flying across the continent. I believe that the millions of dollars of the investing public of America should not be sent to the garbage heap and the junk pile, and that is what we are going to do if we say that the old lines which carried the mail cannot under certain conditions carry the mail again.

The substitute proposes that certificates of convenience and necessity shall be issued by a constituted commission; that the commission shall investigate as to whether or not the certificates shall be issued; that when a certificate shall have been issued, the line to which it is issued shall have the right to carry the mail, and that any of the old lines which carried the mail before and flew a route of 250 miles or more for 6 months before January 1, 1934, shall have a right to a certificate of convenience and, having the right to a certificate of convenience, shall carry the mail if the Postmaster General gives them the mail to carry.

The proposed substitute which I have offered does away with competitive bidding, a thing which, so far as our investigation disclosed, has resulted in no benefit to the country. My proposed substitute would establish a temporary rate structure, to be resorted to and applied temporarily until the commission can find by its investigation what a proper rate structure is. When that is done, then the whole thing goes on and progress comes out of what might otherwise be chaos.

There are three changes which I propose to ask to have made if the substitute shall be adopted. There seems to be language which I have incorporated that might be construed as prohibiting collective bargaining. If the substitute shall be adopted, I will propose to have that changed by a corrective amendment.

Another change has to do with the provision which places in the hands of the commission the right to act as arbitrators between laborers and employers. I think my substitute goes too far in that respect. With the Federal set-ups which now exist, I think that matter should be in the hands of an already existing Federal organization.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Is there any objection to changing the language with respect to collective bargaining in advance of the vote on the substitute of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. McCARRAN. I should be very glad to proceed in that way. I am giving my word to the Senate that I shall propose such a corrective amendment. I would propose it now if I had it at hand, but I have not at the moment.

There is one other change to be made on page 24 of the proposed substitute as it is now at the desk. That is in the provision under the rate structure wherein it appears that the rate shall not be more than 50 cents per pound-mile. That is an error. It should be not to exceed 50 cents per airplane-mile, in order to bring out a just and equitable rate structure.

Mr. President, I do not care what one's political affiliations may be, science is going forward. As I contemplate the picture, America and its scientific development mean more than party alliance, and more than anything else in all the world. I have heard the whisper going the rounds that the bill sponsored by the learned and able Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] and by my learned and wonderful colleague on the committee, the chairman of the special committee [Mr. BLACK], is an administration measure. I have failed so far to hear one authentic word stating that the bill is sponsored by the President of the United States. I am not ready to believe it. But if it were true, and if, after a year of investigation, a committee sworn to do its duty, sitting in the Capital of the Nation, using $50,000 and more of the public money, having investigated the subject, brings forth by at least 4 votes out of the committee membership this proposed substitute, then I say we at least are driving toward the right and toward building up something rather than tearing it down.

We did not assemble to punish anyone. We assembled to find, if possible, the flaws and the loopholes in the existing law, and then to legislate. The substitute now offered bears the stamp of all the thought that I could give to the measure growing out of the investigation on which we have spent nights and days and during which five zealous and determined men have tried to bring forth the truth.

Mr. President, I think I have gone far enough in discussing the subject and have taken enough of the time of the Senate. I do not believe in extended remarks or extended speeches. I have tried to explain the proposed substitute as best I could. I shall be only too glad to answer any questions. I submit the amendment to the Senate of the United States, with the hope that our Nation may take its rightful place among the nations of the earth as a developer of science, and with the hope particularly that the science of aviation which has a future which even the imagination of man cannot grasp may have the support, by legislation, and thought and consideration of men who are resolute to build the country and to build and develop rather than to tear down.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if I were able to vote as I should like to vote, I would vote for condemnation of the manner in which the contracts were let and in condemnation of the manner in which they were terminated. I think politics prevailed in both instances to a very marked degree. I feel quite sure that we would not be justified in passing a measure which seemed to approve of the manner in which the contracts were let. That is the reason why I voted against the substitute proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. I am equally strong in my view that we ought not to pass a measure which would seem to approve the manner in full in which the contracts were terminated. There was an unfortunate element of politics in both incidents.

I do not charge that anyone was individually corrupt. I have not seen any evidence to justify such a charge. But I do feel that a controlling factor in the first instance was politics, and that the second incident was not entirely free of politics.

The measure here, which seems to be the best effort to lift this matter out of politics, is the amendment in the nature of a substitute which has been offered by the able Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN]. It would be most difficult to have a measure in the first instance to cover the situation in full and map out a complete course for dealing with an enterprise of this kind. There are some provisions in the bill I do not approve. It is not just what one would like to have, but certainly it is a beginning, and is a step in the right direction.

Those of us who are not upon the committee have not had an opportunity to follow in detail this matter. We have only gathered from the general reading in the papers, and from the evidence, what seemed to us the true criterion of the situation. Unless we at this time manifest unmistakably our desire to lift this matter out of politics, we shall not have gathered any real fruits from this investigation. It is the kind of an enterprise into which politics ought never to enter; and it seems to me the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] is an effort in that direction. I shall, therefore, vote for it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I regret very much to disagree with my colleague upon the committee, with whom I have worked for so many months. He and I have attempted to expose, from day to day, certain phases of a condition which is such that I am sure if the Senator from Idaho had been present and heard the evidence, he would change his statement that there was nothing in it but politics. I am sure he would go farther and say that he believed it to be fraudulent.

Mr. BORAH. Fraudulent?

Mr. BLACK. That is what I stated; yes.

Mr. BORAH. I would not dispute that. I think if it was fraudulent, it was superinduced for political reasons.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, insofar as the work of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] is concerned, I here pay tribute to his cooperative effort from day to day, and from week to week, and from month to month. We have worked together most pleasantly, and for him I have a sincere and genuine affection. Even if we should concede, however—which I deny—the statement of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that the contracts were terminated for political reasons, I do not agree with the Senator's conclusion that we should pass a bill because it offers a place midway between two conflicting political viewpoints.

These contracts were terminated on the ground of fraud; and with the very high esteem I have for the Senator from Idaho and the very high regard I have for his conception of justice and right, I am sure that if he had been confronted with the same situation he would not have tolerated such contracts for a moment.

But let us get down to the real question.

I realize the value of aviation and the aviation industry to this Nation. If I did not realize that, I would have had less interest in the entire subject. I realize that back through the centuries men have been seeking to conquer the laws of gravity and fly in the air. Centuries before any of us were born aspiring spirits were trying, by investigating the laws of science and the laws of nature, to conquer the air. The people of all civilized nations breathed a sigh of rapture when it was first known that down in North Carolina the Wright brothers had taken off and conquered the air.

Insofar as the spirit of the bill of the Senator from Nevada and that advocated by me is concerned, and insofar as he believes that the fixing of air-mail rates should be taken away from the Post Office Department, there is not, and never has been, the slightest difference between our views. I do believe, however, that the bill we have presented is a more constructive bill and one which will more nearly correct abuses than the measure presented by the Senator from Nevada.

There is not a word in the bill upon which my name appears as one of its champions which will prevent any company from carrying the air mail if it qualifies under the general provisions of the bill. It is not a specialized bill. It sets out general qualifications, and those qualifications must be met.

Let me explain, if I may—and I desire, of course, to be absolutely correct in my statements as to the differences—what are the real differences between the two measures.

In the first place, the bill of the Senator from Nevada provides for the creation of a new aviation commission. I am opposed to that. I do not believe we should create a new commission. I prefer the Interstate Commerce Commission.

That is the first difference.

In the next place, the Senator from Nevada proposes that the new commission shall have power to regulate not only air-mail rates but also passenger rates and freight rates. I do not believe we should go that far at this time. The industry is young. In my judgment, it has not grown to the point where we would be justified in having its rates fixed either by an aviation commission or by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

So the second instance in which there is a disagreement is that under the Senator's bill the commission would have complete power to regulate rates for passenger, freight, express, and air mail, while under the bill which we have proposed the Interstate Commerce Commission would have the power to regulate air-mail rates.

The time may arrive in the very near future when we should regulate passenger rates and freight rates; but, in my judgment, instead of being a constructive thing to do today, it is a retarding movement and will block the progress of the industry and of the science.

Next, both bills provide for the issuance of certificates of convenience and necessity. Our bill provides for the issuance of the certificates by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The other bill provides for the issuance of the certificates by the aviation commission which is to be created.

I pay full tribute to the Senator from Nevada for his desire to place this function in the hands of a new commission, believing that that is the best way to handle it. It just happens that I am opposed to the creation of a new commission. I prefer more concentration of all the transportation systems in one commission—if necessary, dividing it up into parts to handle the different methods of transportation, but having all the authority in one commission or bureau.

I have explained the differences in the two commissions. There are in my bill certain things which I think are absolutely essential and necessary to correct abuses which have been shown to exist.

I am opposed, now and hereafter, to any more holding companies controlling the operations of the transport systems of the Nation. In our bill we have cut that out like an ulcer.

I am opposed to having the transport companies tied up and associated with aviation manufacturing companies, manufacturing planes and engines. I believe that is destructive to the best interests of the industry. We eliminate that. We eliminate holding companies, subsidiaries, associates, and affiliates.

Those who believe that it is better to have the operating transport companies held by a manufacturing company over here, and a holding company over here, and another company over here, and another one here—I call attention to the fact that in one instance they have merged 80 companies—will not agree with my philosophy; but I think the day has come when we need to cut out the holding companies, and to separate and divorce the transport companies from the aviation manufacturing interests.

I have now in my possession a letter from the president of a company to his subordinate, which shows that they set the price of the planes up at whatever level they see fit, and state that they will adjust it at a later period. I am opposed to leaving any such power. Our bill provides for the separation of these interests.

Next, we provide for a minimum wage for pilots, mechanics, and laborers, and stipulate that that minimum wage shall be not less than the rate of compensation paid by air-mail line operators during 1933; and we preserve the right of collective bargaining. I believe in that. It may be wrong, but I believe in it. I believe the time has come when we ought to raise the wages of the men who do the work and cut off the bonuses and gratuities of the men who draw the money only. To that end we have in the bill another provision which limits to $17,500 in 1 year the salary that can be received by any officer. He can receive no more salary, no more gratuity, and no more bonus than that.

The chief things we have found wrong up to this time, in my judgment, have been the following:

First, the holding companies and associates and affiliates which are strangling the operating companies. We prohibit that in our bill.

The next thing is the payment of large salaries and bonuses and gratuities. We prohibit that in our bill. We limit the compensation of any one officer to $17,500 in 1 year.

The next thing is, in my judgment, that while bleeding the company for high compensation, we believe that the officers have been strangling the life out of the men who actually do the work in the planes. Therefore, we have preserved two rights: We have preserved the right of collective bargaining, and we have said that the operators cannot cut down the wages of their employees any lower than the level at which they were fixed in 1933.

Let those who think that is political make the most of it. I want to know who says that there is anything political in a bill which tries to take care of the men who toil and tries to lop off the unnecessary profits and bonuses and gratuities of the men who, in some instances, have drawn as much as $430,000 in 1 year. If that be political, I plead guilty, and I am glad to plead guilty. That is the sense of this bill.

One thing is added to it. We realize that we have not had time to make a full study of military aviation and naval aviation and the branches of manufacture which supply them. Therefore we want an additional study made.

It is not necessary for me to study further to know that we ought to cut off holding companies and subsidiaries and associates. The commission provided for is not supposed to do that, and, therefore, we propose to legislate on it.

It is not necessary for me to investigate further, or for anybody else to investigate further, to know that we ought to fix the minimum wage to be paid to the men who do the work. So we provide for that in the bill.

It is not necessary for me to investigate any further, or for anybody else to investigate further, in order to reach the conclusion that we ought to cut off, once and for all, the opportunity of people, who live partially on Government money, to draw a hundred thousand or two hundred thousand dollar salaries, bonuses, and expenses in 1 year. I am ready to legislate on that question now, and we propose it in the bill.

Mr. President, this is the bill which, to my utter astonishment and amazement, is denominated on this floor a "political measure." I deny that. I am sorry that the Senator who made the statement has left the Chamber. If there is anything political in attempting to protect the wages of the men who work and toil and labor, then I am willing to take the blame. If there is anything political in attempting to cut off the opportunity for men to draw $430,000 in 1 year out of money which comes largely from the taxpayers of this country, then I am willing to take the blame and let it be called a political bill.

It is not a political bill; it is a bill which tends toward cleansing and purifying the aviation industry. It proposes to meet the outstanding, glaring evils which have been shown to exist, and proposes to go farther, and provide for a study of the other problems of aviation.

Mr. President, in my judgment the vision of the Senator from Nevada with reference to the great possibilities of aviation is absolutely correct. I join him in the hope that the industry may make progress. I am for it; but I want it to make progress with a sound and solid and honest basis. I know of no other way in which an industry can make real progress in this country, and it is for that reason that we have championed a bill according to the very outline suggested by the President to the Chairmen of the Committees on Post Offices and Post Roads of the House and the Senate and to myself.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Does the learned Senator from Alabama think that it is necessary, in order to make progress in this science, to couch the management and the control of aviation in the hands of the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, the Postmaster General of the United States?

Mr. BLACK. I have made no such statement. The bill does not so do. The bill provides, as it is written right at this exact moment, that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall make a study of the rates, and be ready in 6 months to fix those rates, and from that very moment those rates shall be the rates which will govern, and not the rates fixed by competitive bidding, by the Postmaster General, or by any other person. I am in thorough sympathy, not for all the reasons, perhaps, which may influence others, that we take this burden off the Post Office Department.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BONE. The Senator from Alabama is well aware of the fact, as is the able Senator from Nevada, that some of the most frightful abuses which ever crept into our whole economic system have been accomplished under the administration of so-called "nonpartisan boards", like State utility boards, under which the scandals in the utility field have arisen. There is no particular virtue in vesting the power in any type of body. I do not know that the Postmaster General would be any more likely to be reached by crooked business interests than some board. As a matter of fact, under our State regulatory boards some of these somber pictures in the utility field have been developed.

I did not want to interject any remarks at this point, but I call the Senator's attention to the Democratic platform. I just open the book at any page, at any point. This is the Democratic Party speaking:

> We condemn private monopoly as intolerable and indefensible.

There are things I do not like in the committee bill, but I feel that the bill of the Senator from Alabama is the better bill—but that bill writes into the law a provision for a certificate of necessity and convenience, establishing private monopoly, as we have done in the power field over all this country. I do not know why anybody should not be permitted to go into that field. I know all the arguments about these certificates of necessity and convenience. I have been tangled in similar fights for 20 years. I do not like the idea of this Government enthroning private monopoly, although I do believe that the bill of the Senator from Alabama is the better bill of the two.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Listening to the learned Senator from Washington, I am reminded of a line of Shakespeare, I think he "doeth protest too much."

I am afraid that in the past the learned Senator from Washington has lent too much of his splendid energy and ability to, and has become too much involved in conditions which are, indeed, too small and too insignificant to come into national legislation, where a great national science and a great national movement are concerned. I have only that remark to make in reply to the learned Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

Mr. BLACK. If the Senator will let me say one more word, I will yield the floor to him.

I just want to add this statement about the bill. It also declares that there shall be no subsidy, which is exactly what the Democratic platform declared in the last campaign.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I had no intention at this point of engaging in a discussion with either the Senator from Nevada or the Senator from Alabama about the bill, but when my learned friend from Nevada suggests that the power controversy, the utility controversy, is a matter confined within State lines, or is a matter of slight importance, the Senator wholly misconceives the nature of that sort of business. Perhaps the Senator from Nevada lives so far from the centers of activity, out in his beautiful western State, that he has lost something of a proper perspective on this question.

We read in the papers that down in Oklahoma, the Oklahoma Gas & Electric Co. is introducing a lot of money into the universities to sell ideas to the boys and girls coming out of school. I note from the Philadelphia Record of this morning that even a former President of the United States, when he was Secretary of Commerce, hastened to procure the publication of a pamphlet, under the auspices of the Smithsonian Institution, to tell the people of this country that public ownership of power was a very bad thing. The power companies are debauching thinking on a national scale.

As for protesting too much, I think we can all refresh our memories about the sad experience of Mr. Pickwick. I was somewhat reminded of him when the Senator so very heatedly assailed the Postmaster General, for whom I hold no brief; I merely look upon him as a human being, with the weaknesses of the average human being, and with probably all the virtues of the average human being. I do not think that because the Postmaster General of this country is going to have anything to do with the conduct of the air-mail business, that of necessity will make him any better or any worse. But as the Senator from Nevada flailed him, and flailed the functions he would presumably perform, I was reminded of a story in the Pickwick Papers.

Poor old Pickwick had the habit of going hunting, and he also had a very great yearning for certain kinds of food. One delicacy which appealed to his instincts was chops and tomato sauce. He was living at the home of a buxom young widow, and when he went hunting on one particular occasion he left a little note saying, "Chops and tomato sauce", on the table, so the charming lady would find it in due course, which she did.

Later she sued Pickwick for breach of promise. Every Member of this body has thrilled as he read this delightful little story of Dickens. The lady hired a very able and brilliant lawyer—like my friend from Nevada—Sergeant Buzfuz. They got into court, and like the Senator from Nevada, he had to build up a case against the defendant in some way, and with that same ability to present beautifully a case which needed to be bolstered just as strongly as possible, as in the matter of criticizing my friend down in the Post Office Department, the able Buzfuz stood before the jury. I can visualize him now, as all of us can. He took this bit of paper in his hand before the 12 gentlemen of the jury in the box, and there he did "protest too much." He said:

> Read this, gentlemen of the jury. What is this message? "Chops and tomato sauce!" "Chops and tomato sauce!" What more sinister words could this villain have used to beguile the heart of this trusting maid?

So I say, I am reminded today of the objurgations of Buzfuz before the jury when my friend says that I do protest too much. I know that he does not want some things done in connection with this air-mail business, but I think I voice the hopes and aspirations and thoughts of a good many people when I say we think that a lot of things ought to be done to it. I think a good many people in this country, when millions of people are out of work, and tired, and hungry, desolated with poverty, are a little tired of the spectacle of a few fellows building monstrous private fortunes out of subsidies in air-mail contracts. They are tired of seeing a man put seven or eight hundred dollars into a game and taking out millions for himself.

I do not think the average citizen of this country would object to subsidizing—if it is desired to use that harsh term—a business, and seeing that it is able to operate, to help it along in the purely formative period of that business. That ought to be the sole function of a subsidy. But we have no right here, no moral right certainly, and are we going to attempt to defend that principle? We have no moral right to make men rich, to make multimillionaires out of them from the United States Treasury under the guise of a subsidy. That is what I object to, and know that the Senator from Alabama is trying to get at and correct by his bill.

I would not have any objection, as a Member of this body, to my Government aiding a small business, an infant industry, so that it might not lose any money, but what I object to, and what I think every patriotic and loyal citizen in this country ought to object to, is enriching men, creating private fortunes, huge, bloated, private superfortunes out of the United States Treasury, and all this over and above the amount of money necessary to make the infant business function.

If some of these air-line companies had taken enough money out of the Treasury of the United States to barely operate their air lines, pay the salaries of their men, and good salaries too, I for one would not have seriously objected to it, but what I do object to is this picture now presented to the country, of a little handful of men being made into supermillionaires—all out of taxpayers' money.

It was huge private fortunes which we were creating. That money did not go into the business; that money did not go into the payment of wages to operators, to pilots, to the buying of ships; that money went far beyond and into a private bank account for some individual.

That is not a subsidy. That is a racket. Who can deny it? The records are full of it. We have hundreds of pages of the most somber pictures presented to this country in years in the subsidy inquiries. That is why I am saying what I am. If there is any moral defense to that, I do not know what it is. If that is right, then let us subsidize organized labor, let us subsidize the railroad brotherhoods. Let us assure every man who gets $150 a month salary from the railroad that this Government will give him $50 a month extra. Who in this body will insist that that is the course we should take? But it is just as right, just as morally defensible, as it is to give a huge private fortune to some subsidy grabber.

What right has anyone here to cast a vote which will make a few men wealthy out of the United States Treasury? That is exactly what has been done in this whole subsidy business.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BONE. I am through.

Mr. McCARRAN. I desire to reply to the Senator that I fear he has not read the proposed substitute.

Mr. President, I desire to be right concerning the rule as to time. I do not believe that I occupied the full 30 minutes, but perhaps I lost the remainder of it. If that be the rule, of course, I should not now have the floor; but I take it that I might be entitled to 30 minutes on the bill and 30 minutes on the substitute. I may be wrong.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will recall, yesterday he used his time on the bill and on the amendment, and then we gave him extra time, as I remember; but I have no desire to cut the Senator off. I hope we may have a vote shortly.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I shall not occupy over 10 minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have not occupied any time. May I not obtain the floor? I will yield to the Senator from Nevada for a question if I may obtain the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Nevada for a question.

Mr. McCARRAN. I thank the Senator from Mississippi.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Nevada that the present occupant of the chair is advised that the Senator from Nevada has spoken both upon the bill and the amendment; but inasmuch as the Senator from Mississippi has obtained the floor, and has yielded to the Senator from Nevada for a question, the Senator from Nevada will proceed.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I wish to express my gratitude to the learned Senator from Mississippi.

The entire thought contained in the proposed substitute comes from a study and a personal application to an assignment of duty given to me by the Senate of the United States. I may have become a little more wrapped up in the subject than the ordinary man would become.

I have tried in the substitute to eliminate everything which would provoke such stings as come from the splendid rapier-like tongue of the learned Senator from Washington. I love his way of hitting straight from the shoulder.

There is not a chance for a subsidy in the proposed substitute. There is not a chance for a monopoly in the proposed substitute. It is drafted with the intendment and purpose that such shall not prevail; and every thought that could be put into the substitute has been poured into it to the end that the opportunity of those who would take the money of the taxpayers of America and use it for the accumulation of great fortunes shall be limited, and that that limit shall come out of the decision of a studious, careful, independent investigating commission.

Mr. President, we may say that commissions become corrupt. I am not going to take issue with the Senator on that. So do individuals become corrupt. I am sorry to have to make that remark. Administrations elected by the sovereign vote of a sovereign people become corrupt, and I am also sorry to have to make that remark. But what we try to do from hour to hour, from day to day, from month to month, is to minimize the opportunity for corruption, and that is all we are lending our efforts to in the proposed substitute.

There is no chance for competitive bidding under the terms of the substitute bill. There is no chance for a rate structure that will pour millions into the pockets of those who would use the taxpayers' money to enhance great fortunes. There is an opportunity for a great future for a great science. It means much for the commerce of the Nation, and, meaning much for the commerce of the Nation, it means much for the world, because this Nation must lead the world in the next 50 years.

We can no more relinquish that responsibility than we can relinquish our name and our history. We are destined to lead. We must lead. We must have the courage to do it; and we must have the courage to use 96 individual judgments here—the sworn judgments of individuals who came here representing sovereign States—to tell the people of the country that we will do the best we know how with our individual judgments, after an investigation which has cost the people of this country thousands upon thousands of dollars.

The pending bill calls for a commission to investigate. I say we have carried on that investigation, and we are going to carry it further, in that we will create a permanent commission to conduct this investigation along scientific lines. The pending bill provides for a commission to exist for 1 year. The substitute provides for a commission that will know its position and investigate without limitation, and give the benefit of its investigation to the people of the country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] to the amendment reported by the committee, as amended.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, before the vote, I desire to have inserted in the RECORD from the New Outlook of this month an article entitled "Trouble Aloft", in which the air-mail situation is discussed by Mr. C. B. Allen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD, as requested.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the New Outlook, Apr. 1934]

TROUBLE ALOFT

By C. B. Allen

By this time even the President's stanchest supporters are beginning to admit that the administration has fumbled the air-mail situation rather badly. They defend Mr. Roosevelt by saying that he was the victim of unwise counselors, but one of the fundamental measures of greatness is the ability to pick sound advisers; and the question arises immediately whether, having wrecked the old air transport set-up in America—which, whatever its vices possessed the shining virtue of being a model in achievement for the rest of the world—he will benefit by any better guidance in his efforts to rebuild the demolished structure.

Thus far the signs have not been very encouraging. The most apparent trend in Washington has been a rather panic-stricken one, a tendency to clutch desperately after big headline names—Orville Wright, the father of aviation; its favorite son, Charles A. Lindbergh; Clarence Chamberlin, Eddie Rickenbacker, and others—to shore up the administration's weakened position in the air-mail situation or possibly to divert attention from the basic issues at stake by a red-hearring investigation of the Army Air Corps. As yet there has been no indication that Mr. Roosevelt intends to abandon the type of advice supplied him by such experts on aviation policy as Postmaster General James A. Farley and Senator Hugo L. Black, who are chiefly responsible for the position in which President Roosevelt currently finds himself. At best it is an unenviable spot. On the one hand Mr. Roosevelt is disclosed as having canceled all of the Government's domestic air-mail contracts, in a glow of righteous indignation over the alleged though apparently never-to-be-proven fact that they were obtained by fraud and collusion; on the other he is permitting at least two of these so-accused "crooked" contractors to go right ahead carrying this country's foreign air mail. Furthermore, he is discovered temporizing timorously with the whole foreign phase of America's air-mail activities, his fearless and forthright pursuit of impartial justice for all and special privilege to none supplanted by an almost farcical attitude of compromise and expediency. To say the least, it is a sorry spectacle.

But it does, perhaps, prove what many of the President's supporters would rather not believe—that he is a practical politician first and a dauntless champion of principles second. In no other way is it possible to account for the Government's incongruous position regarding domestic and foreign air mail; certainly an air line that has been deprived arbitrarily of its contracts to fly the mail within the United States, because of its officials' alleged dishonesty, should not be considered worthy to fly the mail beyond our country's borders—yet that is exactly what has come to pass under the Rooseveltian regime. And this is but an introduction to absurdity, if it is fair to characterize as absurd the insistence upon applying one standard of judgment at home and an entirely different one outside the territorial limits of the United States.

Despite repeated charges in Congress by Representative HAMILTON FISH, following cancelation of all the domestic air-mail contracts, that similar action was withheld by the White House respecting the Government's agreements with its foreign air-mail operators only because of substantial contributions to the Democratic national campaign fund by a director of the airline that enjoys a virtual monopoly in this field, such an explanation of the President's motive for staying his hand somehow lacks conviction. It is far more likely the real reason America's foreign air-mail lines were spared—at least for the time being—was that even a Roosevelt did not dare to take on the international complications that immediately would have resulted from cancelation of their contracts.

For it is one thing to issue a proclamation that the Army Air Corps will take over air-mail flying within the borders of the United States and something else again to attempt any such move with respect to commercial lines extending into foreign territory. In the first place, it would have been physically impossible for the Army or the Navy to take over and operate the 25,000 mile network of international routes flown by Pan American Airways; in the second, it would have been, to say the least, diplomatically and industrially suicidal to make such a move even if Uncle Sam had possessed the equipment and personnel necessary to its execution.

The Pan American system encircles the Caribbean and South America, linking some 31 countries and colonies to the United States in a swift communications chain, which has had a profoundly beneficial effect in the 5 years of its existence on this country's diplomatic and trade relations with its Latin American neighbors. But while the suspicions and distrust born of a half century's bungling and exploitation in this field may have been somewhat lulled in so short a period, they are far from having been eradicated. Any attempt to operate Yankee military planes through the domain of these small but sensitive Latin American countries instantly would have been denounced, and, if necessary, repelled as armed invasion on the part of the United States, no matter what efforts were made to disguise it as a temporary emergency expedient.

There would also have been even more disastrous effects in another direction. The group of men responsible for the Pan American Airways system were aided and abetted in building it up at almost every turn by various branches of the United States Government; the Post Office Department pumped the lifeblood of financial support into its veins; the State Department did what it could to smooth the way for its negotiations at Latin American capitals; the War and Navy Departments rendered such aid as they could and gave the project their moral support; while the Department of Commerce, because of the far-reaching effects such a development inevitably would have on this country's South American trade, gave the venture its whole-hearted backing. In effect, though it was a private undertaking, the Yankee dream of air empire in the Western Hemisphere was sponsored and vouched for by the accredited representatives of this Government, and for Mr. Roosevelt, or anyone else in authority, to have aboutfaced and declared out of a clear sky that the air line was unworthy to do any more business with Uncle Sam would have dealt almost as serious a blow to this country's own standing as to that of the air line. For Pan American inevitably has assumed the aspects of a Yankee national institution, in the eyes of our Latin American neighbors, and it would be next to impossible to disabuse their minds of this viewpoint. In such a case disillusionment is a two-edged sword.

It should be made clear that there is no direct connection between the contracts held by our foreign air-mail operators and the domestic air-mail agreements abrogated at the direction of the President because of an allegedly fraudulent and collusive conference with former Postmaster General Walter F. Brown at which all of the domestic air-mail operators were represented. Foreign and domestic air-mail contracts were let under separate and distinct statutes, and no foreign air-mail contractor attended Mr. Brown's so-called "spoils conference" except the two mentioned earlier, who were present in their dual capacity of domestic and foreign air-mail operators. But it is clearer still that if, as many of its critics believe, the administration merely seized upon the "spoils conference" as a technical pretext by which it could wreck the whole domestic air-mail set-up, there were just as good excuses available whereby it might have canceled this country's foreign air-mail contracts. Indeed, the most obvious of these have just been outlined above; half of the Government, it seems, went to bat for Pan American Airways in its struggle to establish a Latin American operating system—doubtless under the patriotic conviction that such a development would be for the benefit of this country as a whole—but it would be very easy for a new set of political rulers to construe these actions as collusion of the most sinister sort. And this, of course, is exactly what happened in the case of the Brown spoils conference, if one is to credit the sworn testimony either of Mr. Brown or the air-mail operators who participated therein.

It is doubtful if either Mr. Roosevelt or his advisers had any idea of the aftermath possibilities of the air-mail situation when he made his decision to wipe out all contracts with the domestic air lines. Compared to the country's great industries, the gross business of the air lines adds up to an insignificant figure, and the number of people whose patronage they enjoy—a half a million passengers a year—would seem to be an almost negligible factor in the great mass of American population when it comes to the politician's inevitable weighing of popular sentiment. Besides, the President's action against the air lines was to be launched under the tried and proven auspices of an assault on intrenched capital, on powerful Wall Street financed combinations which already had been portrayed by the one-sided revelations of a Senate investigating committee as ruthless plunderers of a paternalistic Government rendered supine and vulnerable through the treacherous cooperation of a former administration.

To a political mind the thing must have seemed sure fire; another master stroke in the campaign to establish Mr. Roosevelt firmly in the public mind as a relentless foeman of the vested interests and the tireless champion of the "forgotten man." This analysis, indeed, was borne out completely by the popular clamor resulting from the Senate committee's revelations. Under the adroit, if not altogether fair, guidance of Chairman HUGO LAFAYETTE BLACK, there seemed to have been created what one so frequently hears referred to in Washington these days as a favorable press. The time appeared to be entirely ripe for a spectacular play from the White House.

But the strategists reckoned only with the apparent facts—and thereby they handed the President a poker that was designed to become very hot indeed. They had foreseen the tortured protests of the air lines, the cries of "confiscation" and even of "conviction without trial"; nay, they had counted on them—for Nero himself got no thrill out of the mere sight of a lion appeasing its hunger on passive and nonresisting Christians. There had been loud protestations before, and not from such small-fry capitalists either; impotent and therefore all the more furious shouting about "constitutional rights." And, so far, it had clicked beautifully with a depression-scarred electorate in whose hearts smoldered an enduring hatred of all bankers.

They failed to take into consideration, however, the fundamental difference between the situation with which they were now dealing and the other industries that had been made to feel the dictatorlike hand of the new deal. This can be summed up in the statement that a popular President in these extraordinary times may perfectly well get away with industrial murder against an unpopular old order of things, so long as dollars only are being led to the slaughter; but that his support will turn to opposition as sure as the results begin to be measured in terms of human life. There are millions of ears in America today that are not averse to the screams of a captain of industry undergoing financial crucifixion (which he may or may not deserve), but other chords entirely are struck by the agonized sob of a mother who reads over a fellow bus passenger's shoulder the headline "Army Mail Pilot Killed in Crash" and learns upon fearful inquiry that the victim is her son.

It strikes deep in the sympathy of the average American to read that another pilot's mother had lived in dread of the sound of her own doorbell, because each time it rang she was afraid that it was someone bearing news that her only son had been added to the list of those killed trying to fly the mail—a dismal foreboding that eventually came to tragic fulfillment. Then, too, there was the bride in far-away Texas, who was preparing to celebrate her first wedding anniversary when the news was flashed from Cheyenne, Wyo., that the husband she had hoped to see in a few days had perished with another youngster, fresh out of the Air Corps training schools, in the flaming wreck of a military ship with which they were practicing the air-mail routes.

One or two such incidents, though they might shake the resolution of a sensitive and very human President who felt that he had, even indirectly, brought them to pass, could be dismissed philosophically on the assurance of "expert" advisers that they were only the outcome of a natural law of averages. But as the crimson tide rose higher and higher about the White House steps and a storm of protest was loosed in every part of the Nation, both Mr. Roosevelt's humanitarian instincts and his political astuteness revolted at the wanton human sacrifice. Acting as swiftly as he had in canceling the air lines' contracts, he halted both the mail and the slaughter when 4 deaths in a single day had brought to 10 deaths the Army's total losses incident to a little more than 2 weeks' operation of the air mail. The thing had turned into a boomerang, and the broken bodies and wrecked machines it had dumped into the administration's lap upon its return were apt to become a political millstone about the new deal's neck.

The hapless Chief of the Army Air Corps, Maj. Gen. Benjamin D. Foulois, who had seemed to play a very small part indeed in the preliminaries of launching a military air-mail service on 10 days' notice—the limelight having been almost completely monopolized by his nonflying superior, Gen. Douglas MacArthur, Chief of Staff of the Army, who was full of assurances to the press that the Army could do as good, if not a better, job of flying the mail than the commercial air lines—now became the goat. The wily MacArthur, except for an uncomfortable session on the White House carpet in which both he and General Foulois are reported to have experienced the blazing wrath of the President for allowing him to believe that the Air Corps was adequately equipped and properly trained to fly the mail, slipped from under very neatly by asserting that he first learned through the newspapers of Mr. Roosevelt's order for the Army to take over the air mail. It was not very convincing, even to those who had forgotten his published boasts of a month before, but it was at least an out. This is the same General MacArthur, by the way, who handled the bonus army situation for Mr. Hoover with such bayonetted brilliance.

Lindbergh was another factor in the air-mail contract cancelations that the new deal strategists either failed to take into account or underestimated woefully in their advance calculations. Possibly Mr. Roosevelt has listened too seriously to the newspaper correspondents with whom he is surrounded, many of whom are openly hostile to a man they have never understood, whose confidence—and in many cases, whose respect—they have been unable to gain. Or, possibly, because he is a great popular hero himself, Mr. Roosevelt did not realize that anyone else might exercise an equally strong hold on the affection and regard of the American people. In any event, he sensed quickly enough that there was anything but unanimous popular support of his attempt to put Lindbergh in his place for daring to assert that the President had been unfair in his autocratic treatment of the air-mail operators, and to say that they deserved the basic American privilege of trial before conviction.

Evidence of this was given when the absurd charge of "publicity seeking" by Lindbergh had resulted in a storm of criticism from the public, by the very obvious overture later on of inviting Lindbergh to confer with George H. Dern, Secretary of War, about the problems of Army aviation. No one for a moment supposes that Mr. Dern would have extended such an invitation without the prior assurance that such a move was desired by the President; indeed, it might easily have been made grounds for requesting the Secretary of War's resignation had he taken this step when Mr. Roosevelt was not in a mood to heal the apparent breach between himself and the country's foremost idol.

It is to the credit of Lindbergh's judgment, or that of his advisers, that he refused politely but firmly to walk into the neat trap laid for him by the administration when Mr. Dern subsequently asked him to sit on a committee to investigate the very matters they had discussed informally at their first meeting. For such an inquiry, Lindbergh pointed out, must inevitably deal with the Army's air-mail fiasco, a situation created in the beginning by what he considered an unjust and un-American procedure.

Being already on record concerning that issue, with a request that the air lines be given a fair hearing before being irrevocably deprived of their contracts, the reasonableness and logic of which, incidentally, has been sedulously sidestepped by the Roosevelt regime, he would have been an utter dolt to have followed any such aeronautical red herring as Secretary Dern dragged vainly across the trail. As to the other members of the proposed committee, with Orville Wright also declining to serve, and only Clarence Chamberlin accepting, it is clearly a packed jury picked from the Army's General Staff. The purpose, apparently, is to justify the same nonflying generals' conduct of the Air Corps since this branch of the service was deprived of the Assistant Secretary of War for Aeronautics which it enjoyed under the preceding administrations, and now so sorely needs to turn the tide of its losing battle with the brass hats at Washington.

The man in the street, whether he inclines to back up Lindbergh or the President in his view on the air-mail contracts, obviously has come to the very definite conviction that something is basically wrong with the Air Corps. Unfortunately, the latter is in no position to defend itself without being open to the charge of trying to alibi, while a nontechnical and somewhat unreasoning public either cannot or will not differentiate between various types of flying. The general attitude is that, if the Air Corps' flyers are as good pilots as they should be, they ought to be able to fly anywhere, any time anyone else can. The public refuses to take into account the fact that, in the name of governmental economy, the Army's airmen have been starved on flying time until even their military efficiency has been woefully endangered (one of the men killed carrying the mail had flown a total of less than 24 hours in the 18 months before being called to this hazardous duty in the midst of the year's worst flying weather) and the further all-important truth that an air-mail pilot's job is highly specialized work for which the best flyer in the world would require months, if not years, of familiarization training under the guidance of experienced air line men.

It must be remembered in any fair discussion of the subject that 90 percent or more of the men who have been flying for the commercial air lines are former Army or Navy airmen. Before they broke in as air-line pilots—and they broke in not as a group taking over a difficult operation in its entirety but as apprentice pilots under veterans familiar with the routes they were flying—they had been trained as thoroughly in military aeronautics as the men who are now blamed because they have not made a brilliant success of flying the air mail. Nor do such men, in the normal development of air-line pilots, come to be trusted with passengers and mail until they have been trained in this manner anywhere from 1 to 3 years. Is it any wonder then that the Nation has been paying a terrific price for its crippled Air Mail Service in the last month (before it was canceled entirely the volume of mail had fallen off more than 50 percent, and the percentage of scheduled flights completed by at least an equal amount) and that its chief value has been to the grisly souvenir trade which ranks high a postcard or letter—especially if it be torn or partially burned—rescued from the wreckage in which some pilot has died?

In one or more of his famous radio talks with the American people, President Roosevelt declared that out of the many things he was attempting to accomplish, he undoubtedly would make mistakes, but that he hoped to have the courage both to admit and correct them. He must know by now that "it does not go down" with many Americans who have been his steadfast supporters that the air lines should have been deprived both of their property and the right to defend themselves before being so penalized. He certain knows that he has been on the wrong track in ordering an unprepared Army to carry the mail—his own acts constituting a grudging admission of this when he ordered an end of the useless slaughter. Where is this courage to admit and rectify mistakes? Why doesn't he go back to the beginning and start again, punishing the guilty if such are revealed in a court of justice, but repairing the obvious and almost irreparable injury he has done to an outstanding industry by reinstating those who can prove their innocence?

So the committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading and read a third time?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR URGENT NEEDS IN PUBLIC SERVICES

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. GLASS. Yesterday the Senate passed a joint resolution (H.J.Res. 332) to provide appropriations to meet urgent needs in certain public services, and for other purposes. I want to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the joint resolution was passed in order that I may move to amend it. Would it be in order to move now to reconsider the vote and bring it up Monday?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I inquire if the joint resolution has left the Senate and gone to the House?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is advised that the joint resolution has not left the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then the Senator's motion would be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia may now submit his motion.

Mr. GLASS. Very well. I move to reconsider the votes by which the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The motion was agreed to.

MUNICIPAL DEBT READJUSTMENTS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5950) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

I may state that, if the motion shall be agreed to, it is my intention to ask for a brief executive session and then to move a recess until Monday.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am in full accord with the program, but I should like to ask the Senator if that bill is to be followed by the corporation bankruptcy bill, so called?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I understand the question asked by the Republican leader of the Democratic leader, when final disposition shall have been made of the bill which the Senator from Arkansas now wants made the unfinished business, it is proposed to take up the bill referred to by the Senator from Oregon and it is to be made the unfinished business.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Perhaps I spoke too hastily about that bill. I have stated to the Senator from Oregon that an opportunity to consider the bill to which he referred will be afforded, if I can contribute to that end, during the present session. I think that matter should be left open.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I want it left open.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well. I do not desire to announce at this time what measure will be proposed to succeed the one which I am now asking to have made the unfinished business.

Mr. McNARY. I am not agitating the corporation bankruptcy bill. Inquiry has come to me from different sources with reference to the bill, and that is the reason why I propounded the inquiry.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand that.

Mr. NORRIS. I am finding no fault with the Senator from Oregon, but there is a joint resolution pending to amend the Constitution, for which I have been trying to get consideration without interfering at all with the program of the leaders. I do not want the program laid out too far in advance. I do not want to be forced to make a motion to take up that joint resolution if I can avoid it, but if it is necessary, I am going to do so in order to have the Senate consider the joint resolution at this session. It is a joint resolution that will have to be acted on by the House, of course, and it ought to be considered by the Senate at the earliest possible time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 5950) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto."

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McCARRAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Anton J. Lukaszewicz, of Wisconsin, to be United States marshal, eastern district of Wisconsin, to succeed James N. Tittemore, term expired.

Mr. CONNALLY, from the Committee on Finance, reported favorably the nomination of Mabel Gittinger, of Chariton, Iowa, to be collector of customs for customs district no. 44, with headquarters at Des Moines, Iowa, in place of Nellie Gregg Tomlinson.

The nomination is that of Alex McKenzie Vierhus to be collector of internal revenue for the State of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that the nomination may be acted on at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request submitted by the Senator from Washington that the nomination reported from the Committee on Finance by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] be acted on at this time?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I did not hear the Senator's request.

Mr. DILL. I am asking that the nomination for collector of internal revenue in the State of Washington may be acted on today in order that, if it be confirmed, the nominee may take his office immediately. His predecessor has been appointed Federal judge at Seattle and is anxious to take office.

Mr. McNARY. He could not take office tomorrow, this being Saturday. Why should not the matter go over until Monday?

Mr. DILL. Because if the nomination could be confirmed today and I could get the Senate to permit immediate notification to the President, the commission could be signed

Monday and the appointed judge could take office on Tuesday.

Mr. McNARY. I do not think we should proceed in that way. I shall be glad to cooperate with the Senator Monday and shall be glad to waive the usual delay in notifying the President. However, I must object at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I move that the nomination be rejected.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I inquire why the Senator from Missouri is moving to have it rejected?

Mr. CLARK. I am moving to reject the nomination on the ground that the nominee is personally objectionable and obnoxious to me.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The committee reported it adversely.

Mr. CLARK. Yes; there is an adverse report from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. LONG. I am going to vote with the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on confirming the nomination.

The nomination was rejected.

REGULATION OF COMMERCE IN PETROLEUM

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (S. 3495) to regulate commerce in petroleum, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, this bill has to do with the oil industry. I ask that the bill as introduced be printed in the RECORD, and that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the bill was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill to regulate commerce in petroleum, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc.

SECTION 1. Declaration of policy: The petroleum industry of the United States is an industry affected with a national public interest. Commerce in petroleum and the products thereof is carried on in and between all of the States of the United States and with foreign nations. Such commerce moves in a constant and continuous stream from sources of supply into great interstate systems of transportation to widely separated interstate markets. It is impossible practically to distinguish and separate the petroleum which is not to move across State lines from that which is to move across State lines. The market for petroleum and the products thereof is essentially interstate in character and the vast majority of the transactions involve shipments from producers and refiners in the relatively few oil-producing States to buyers and consumers in all of the other States of the Union and in foreign nations. Transactions which are themselves intrastate in character are reflected in the interstate market and directly affect interstate commerce. The interstate market for petroleum and the products thereof is subject to violent fluctuations in price to the detriment of both the industry and the consumer. The known petroleum resources of the United States are capable at the present time of supplying far in excess of the consumptive demand for petroleum and its products. There exist also vast surpluses of petroleum in storage which have tended unduly to depress the interstate market and to render the industry unprofitable and uncertain. There is a very definite need for rehabilitation of the industry to the end that the facilities for distribution of petroleum and its products may be maintained, that the growth of monopoly resulting from uncontrolled and damaging competition may be prevented, and that adequate supplies of petroleum and its products may be made available to consumers at fair and reasonable prices. A demoralized and uncontrolled interstate market for petroleum and its products causes premature depletion of flush fields and the abandonment of wells of settled production which are the basis of the Nation's petroleum resources. The preservation of an ample and inexpensive supply of petroleum, which is an exhaustible natural resource, is essential to the effective maintenance both of these instrumentalities of interstate commerce and of those agencies of national defense which are dependent upon petroleum and its products for fuel and lubrication.

The petroleum industry is, therefore, essentially national and interstate in character. Commerce in petroleum and its products within each State is so dependent upon, affected by, and concerned with such commerce in other States that a State by itself cannot successfully regulate and protect transactions within its own boundaries. The preservation of commerce in petroleum and its products within the several States requires a unified effective system of regulation.

It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to control and to regulate in the public interest commerce in petroleum produced in all or any of the several States in order to restore and maintain the normal flow of interstate commerce, to prevent the premature abandonment of wells of settled production, to prevent the growth of monopoly arising out of a demoralized national market for petroleum and the products thereof, to provide for the national defense, to protect the Nation's resources of petroleum by providing for the scientific development of new sources of supply, to protect the continuing functioning of the Nation's transportation facilities, and to rehabilitate facilities of the industry for the production, manufacture, and distribution of this essential natural resource, which must be conserved.

SEC. 2. Investigations and reports: The Secretary of the Interior is authorized and empowered, when in his judgment necessary to effectuate the purposes of this act, to make investigations into and to collect statistical and other data pertaining to the petroleum industry, both domestic and foreign, to require periodical and special reports relating to the industry, from persons engaged in the petroleum industry, and to examine and inspect their books, records, papers, and properties for the purpose of verifying such reports.

SEC. 3. Cooperation with other bodies: (a) The Secretary of the Interior may cooperate with executives, officials, and agencies of the States in the study and investigation of matters relating to the petroleum industry and may hold joint hearings upon such matters with any duly authorized State agency. The Secretary of the Interior, when participating in any such joint hearing, shall have all the powers enumerated in section 9 of this act.

(b) The Secretary of the Interior may cooperate with, and encourage the establishment and continuations of, unofficial national, regional, State, and local committees of the petroleum industry.

(c) The several departments and bureaus of the United States Government shall, at the request of the Secretary of the Interior, provide the Secretary of the Interior with all records, papers, and information which they may have available pertaining to the petroleum industry.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Interior shall limit the importation of petroleum and its products to such amounts as will prevent imports of petroleum and its products from unreasonably interfering with current domestic production by supplying an undue proportion of the domestic consumptive and export demand for petroleum and its products. The Secretary of the Interior shall establish quotas of imports of petroleum and its products for the various importers thereof by equitably allocating the total amount of authorized imports of petroleum and its products among the various importers thereof, and may require importers to secure certificates of authorization before importing into the United States any petroleum or its products. The Secretary of the Interior shall not permit in any month the importation either of crude petroleum or any of the products of crude petroleum in excess of the average monthly imports of such crude petroleum or of any such product of crude petroleum during the last 6 months of 1932.

SEC. 5. Consumptive and market demand and quotas for movement in commerce: (a) The Secretary of the Interior shall periodically, upon a scientific and impartial evaluation of all available pertinent data, determine the demand for consumption in the United States and the demand for export from the United States for petroleum and the products thereof. Using such determination as a basis, the Secretary of the Interior may then determine the reasonable market demand for petroleum and the products thereof from any State, pool, field, lease or property, storage unit, or other similar source of supply. In determining such reasonable market demand, the Secretary of the Interior shall also give due consideration to:

(1) The requirements of trading areas and the customary source of supply for such areas.

(2) Changes and trends in respect to trade areas or sources of supply.

(3) The location, volume of business, operating conditions, and potential capacity of refineries and of other users of petroleum, and changes and trends with respect to such business.

(4) State conservation laws and the orders of State regulatory agencies for the regulation or allocation of petroleum production.

(5) The location, quantity, and distribution of ownership of stored petroleum and its products, as well as the situation and requirement of owners.

(6) Physical and economic conditions of fields, pools, wells, leases, or properties constituting sources of supply of petroleum.

(7) Past, current, and anticipated importation into the United States of petroleum and the products thereof.

(8) Such other factors as he may deem necessary to a fair and equitable determination of the reasonable market demand from any source of supply.

(b) The Secretary of the Interior may prescribe quotas of petroleum for movement in commerce from such States, pools, fields, leases or properties, storage units, or other sources of supply as the Secretary of the Interior may deem necessary to effectuate the purposes of this act. The quota prescribed for any such source of supply shall be equal to the reasonable market demand for petroleum from that source of supply as determined by the Secretary of the Interior under this section: Provided, that in setting quotas for movement in commerce from new sources of supply of petroleum, such quotas shall be established under a plan which will provide for the scientific development of and for the orderly entrance into commerce of petroleum from such new sources of supply. It shall be unlawful for any person to place in commerce or receive in commerce by sale, purchase, exchange, consignment, shipment, delivery, or otherwise, (1) any petroleum from any such source of supply in excess of the quotas so prescribed, (2) or any product made from petroleum obtained from such source of supply in excess of the quotas so prescribed.

SEC. 6. Production quotas: If the Secretary of the Interior shall determine that the effective enforcement of quotas prescribed pursuant to section 5 of this act requires the establishment of quotas for the production of petroleum within or from any State, pool, field, lease, property, or well, the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe quotas for the production in or from such State, pool, field, lease, property, or well. The same factors shall be considered in determining such quotas for production as are provided herein for the determination of quotas for movement in commerce. It shall be unlawful for any person to produce petroleum in excess of quotas for production so prescribed or to make or manufacture any product of such petroleum, or to buy or otherwise deal in such petroleum or the products thereof.

SEC. 7. Certificates of clearance: To make effective restrictions or quotas prescribed pursuant to this act, certificates of clearance for petroleum or any of the products thereof may be required by order of the Secretary of the Interior in such areas and at such times as the Secretary of the Interior shall deem necessary. It shall be unlawful for any person to transport or accept for transportation petroleum or the products thereof from any such area without first receiving from the shipper such certificates of clearance as may be required by the said orders of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 8. Rules and regulations: In the administration, enforcement, and interpretation of this act the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and empowered to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act and his duties hereunder. Without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the Secretary of the Interior is specifically authorized and empowered to issue rules and regulations:

(a) Requiring the submission by persons engaged in the petroleum industry of periodical or special reports concerning matters relating to the petroleum industry and prescribing the form and contents thereof.

(b) Requiring persons engaged in the petroleum industry to keep available for inspection all books, records, papers, and properties of such persons which may in any way pertain to the interest or activities of such persons in the petroleum industry.

(c) Requiring that persons engaged in the petroleum industry keep full and adequate records of the interest and activities of such persons in the petroleum industry: Provided, however, That any rule or regulation promulgated under this subsection shall clearly and specifically state the interests and activities concerning which such records must be kept.

(d) Prescribing the form and contents of any certificates of clearance which may be required pursuant to section 7 of this act.

(e) Determining procedure for hearings, including the manner of giving notice of such hearings: Provided, however, That no rules or regulations promulgated under this subsection shall be inconsistent with the provisions of section 9 of this act.

SEC. 9. Hearings: (a) Before prescribing quotas pursuant to sections 4, 5, and 6 of this act, hearings shall be held after reasonable notice (in no case less than 10 days), and at any such hearing any person or governmental body interested in the subject matter of the hearing shall be entitled to be heard: Provided, however, That in case an emergency is found to exist by the Secretary of the Interior, temporary quotas for a period not exceeding 31 days may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior without notice or hearing; but such temporary quotas shall thereafter be equitably adjusted at the earliest practicable date, and such adjustment shall be made after notice and hearing as heretofore provided: And provided further, That any orders of findings of State regulatory agencies relating to production or movement of petroleum may be adopted by the Secretary of the Interior for the purpose of prescribing quotas pursuant to sections 5 and 6 of this act without the necessity of a hearing. Determinations of fact made pursuant to this subsection shall be conclusive and not subject to review.

(b) The Secretary of the Interior may hold such other hearings as may be deemed necessary to effectuate the purposes of this act and to insure its fair administration. Whenever such other hearings are held after reasonable notice (in no case less than 5 days), determinations of fact made at such hearings shall be conclusive and not subject to review.

SEC. 10. Witnesses and testimony: The Secretary of the Interior shall have the power to examine witnesses, receive evidence and administer oaths and affirmations, to take affidavits and depositions, and to require by subpena the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, records, and papers. Such attendance of witnesses, and the production of such books, records, and papers may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing. In case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpena issued to any person, the Secretary of the Interior may invoke the aid of any district court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which a hearing is being or is about to be held, or within the jurisdiction of which the person guilty of contumacy or refusal to obey resides or carries on business or is found, and such court may issue appropriate orders requiring such person to obey such subpena; and any failure to obey any such order of the court may be punished by said court as a contempt thereof.

The Secretary of the Interior may order testimony to be taken by deposition in any proceeding or investigation pending under this act at any stage of such proceeding or investigation. Such depositions may be taken before any person designated by the Secretary of the Interior and having power to administer oaths. Such testimony shall be reduced to writing by the person taking the deposition, or under his direction, and shall then be subscribed by the deponent. Any person may be compelled to appear and depose and to produce books, records, and papers in the same manner as witnesses may be compelled to appear and testify and produce books, records, and papers before the Secretary of the Interior as hereinbefore provided.

Witnesses shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States, and witnesses whose depositions are taken and the persons taking the same shall severally be entitled to the same fees as are paid for like services in the courts of the United States.

No person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, records, or papers before the Secretary of the Interior or in obedience to the subpena of the Secretary of the Interior on the ground or for the reason that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him may tend to criminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture. But no natural person, after having claimed his privilege against self-incrimination, shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify, or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, before the Secretary of the Interior in obedience to a subpena issued by him: Provided, That no natural person so testifying shall be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

SEC. 11. Court review: (a) Any person adversely affected by any decision, order, rule, or regulation issued or promulgated after notice and hearing pursuant to section 9 of this act, and who has exhausted his administrative remedies hereunder, shall be entitled, upon petition to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, to have the questions of law in his case reviewed by such court.

(b) Any person adversely affected by any order, rule, or regulation issued or promulgated without notice and hearing pursuant to section 9 of this act, or by any act done or threatened thereunder, and who has exhausted his administrative remedies hereunder, may seek court review by a suit for injunction in an appropriate district court of the United States. Such suit shall be tried in accordance with general equitable principles: Provided, however, That no temporary, permanent, or other injunction or writ shall issue in such suit unless the case shall have been fully heard and determined by three judges in the same manner as provided in section 47 of title 28 of the Code of Laws of the United States of America. An appeal may be taken directly to the Supreme Court of the United States from any order granting or denying a temporary, permanent, or other injunction or writ in any such case.

(c) The provisions of this section for court review of decisions, orders, rules, and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior, and action taken or threatened thereunder, shall be exclusive.

SEC. 12. Enforcement of orders of the Secretary of the Interior: If any person fails or neglects to obey any order, rule, or regulation of the Secretary of the Interior while the same is in effect, the Secretary of the Interior, or the United States by its Attorney General, may apply to an appropriate district court of the United States for the enforcement of such order, rule, or regulation. The court shall enforce obedience to such order, rule, or regulation by a writ of injunction or other proper process, mandatory or otherwise, the court may also require any person who has moved in commerce petroleum or the products thereof, or who has produced petroleum in excess of the applicable quota prescribed pursuant to the terms of this act, to reduce his future movements in commerce or his future production of petroleum, as the case may be, to an amount below such quota so as to make up for the amount of his excess movements or production.

SEC. 13. Penalties: Any person who shall violate any provisions of this act or any order, rule, or regulation issued or promulgated pursuant to this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $1,000 or by imprisonment for not longer than 1 year, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and each day such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense. Any person who shall import into the United States any petroleum or its products in violation of section 4 of this act, or who shall place or receive in commerce, produce, transport, or accept for transportation petroleum or the products thereof in violation of any order issued pursuant to sections 5, 6, and 7 of this act, shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $1 for every barrel (42 United States gallons) of petroleum or the products thereof imported or so placed or received in commerce, produced, transported, or accepted for transportation, which forfeiture shall be payable into the Treasury of the United States and shall be recoverable in a civil suit in the name of the United States brought in the district where the offense was committed or in any district where such person may be found. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior and of the various district attorneys to prosecute for the recovery of forfeitures. The costs and expenses of such prosecution shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States.

Any person who shall neglect or refuse to attend and testify, or to answer any lawful inquiry, or to produce any books, records, or other papers, if in his power to do so, in obedience to the subpena or lawful requirement of the Secretary of the Interior, shall be guilty of an offense, and upon conviction thereof by a court of competent jurisdiction shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Any person who shall make, or cause to be made, any false entry or statement of fact in any report required to be made under this act, or who shall make, or cause to be made, any false entry in any account, record, or memorandum kept by any person subject to this act, or who shall neglect or fail to make, or cause to be made, full, true, and correct entries in such accounts, records, or memoranda of all facts and transactions pertaining to the interest or activities in the petroleum industry of such person as may be required by the Secretary of the Interior, or who shall remove out of the jurisdiction of the United States, or multilate, alter, or by any other means falsify any books, records, or other papers pertaining to the interests or activities of such person in the petroleum industry; or who shall refuse to submit to the Secretary of the Interior or to any of his authorized agents, for the purpose of inspection and taking copies, any books, records, or other papers pertaining to the interest or activities of such person in his possession or within his control, shall be demed guilty of an offense against the United States, and shall be subject, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, to a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $5,000 or to imprisonment for a term of not more than 3 years, or to both such fine and imprisonment.

Any person aiding and abetting any other person in the violation of any provision of this act or any order, rule, or regulation issued pursuant thereto shall be subject to the same penalties as are prescribed herein for the offense of such other person.

SEC. 14. Petroleum Administrative Board; establishment and duties: There shall be established in the Department of the Interior a board to be known as the Petroleum Administrative Board, which shall be composed of not more than seven members to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior and who shall be qualified by education and experience to discharge their duties. The board shall appoint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and without regard to the Civil Service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, such qualified attorneys, economists, geologists, statisticians, and other employees as may be required to enable the board and the Secretary of the Interior to carry out the purposes of this act. The scientific and professional employees of the board shall be selected solely upon the basis of their scientific or professional qualifications. No person having a direct pecuniary interest in the petroleum industry, or who is in the employ of any person engaged in the petroleum industry, shall be a member or employee of the board.

The Secretary of the Interior may delegate any or all of his powers under this act to the board and its duly authorized agents, either absolutely or subject to such conditions or regulations as he may in his discretion impose.

SEC. 15. National Industrial Recovery Act: This act shall not be construed to repeal the National Industrial Recovery Act or any portion thereof and shall repeal only such portions of the Code of Fair Competition for the Petroleum Industry, adopted pursuant to the National Industrial Recovery Act, as are necessarily inconsistent herewith.

SEC. 16. Saving clause: Any offense committed, or any right accrued, or any penalty or obligation incurred prior to the effective date of this act under any provision of law repealed by this act, may be prosecuted or enforced in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been enacted.

SEC. 17. Separability of provisions: If any provision of this act or any clause, sentence, or part thereof be held unconstitutional or invalid for any reason, or the applicability thereof to any person, circumstance, commodity, or class of transactions with respect to any commodity be held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the act and the applicability of such provisions to other persons, circumstances, commodities, and classes of transactions shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 18. Definitions: The words defined in this section shall have the following meaning when found in this act, to wit:

(a) "Petroleum industry" means the producing, selling, shipping, processing, refining, transporting, or otherwise dealing in petroleum or the products thereof, including natural gasoline and natural gas produced in conjunction with petroleum.

(c) "State" means the District of Columbia and any State, Territory, or possession of the United States.

(d) "Person" means any natural person, corporation, association, partnership, executor, administrator, receiver, or trustee.

SEC. 19. SEC. 20. Short title: This act may be cited as the "Federal Petroleum Act."

Mr. DAVIS and Mr. WALSH submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 228), which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to examine into the relationship existing between contractors and their employees engaged in the construction of any public building, public work, or building or work in the District of Columbia financed in whole or in part by loans or grants from the United States, or in the repair thereof, with a view to determining (1) if such employees receive the prevailing rates of wages of building-trades workers; (2) if such employees are forced to give up any part of the compensation to which they are entitled under their contract of employment, a practice known as the "kick-back racket"; and (3) if such employees are discharged and refused further employment on such construction projects for protesting against such "kick-back racket" or other abuses. THE AIR MAIL SERVICE

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I have here a news article from the Washington Sunday Star quoting Elliot Roosevelt, son of our President, on his plan of how to run the Air Mail Service.

The latest news in the air-mail racket is that it is reported that Elliot Roosevelt, son of our well-known President, is in Washington with a plan to take over the service. Whom he represents has not been made public. It may be E. L. Cord or it may not, but it seems certain he does not appear for the companies whose contracts were canceled without a hearing. The fact that his father is the President of the United States, and the further fact that his father in such official capacity canceled the contracts of the others, will, it is supposed, not mitigate against young Roosevelt in his quest for this highly profitable undertaking.

Recently the Roosevelt family stood aghast when it was alleged that the son of a Republican Senator received cigaret money from an airplane company holding a mail contract.

I have just one suggestion to make, and this is that the Roosevelts not incorporated start a correspondence school for the benefit of the 12,000,000 unemployed and sell them a course on "how to get a job."

I ask leave to print this article in the RECORD and that it be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

There being no objection, the article was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Sunday Star, Apr. 29, 1934]

ELLIOTT ROOSEVELT QUOTED FAVORING AVIATION SUBSIDY—COMMERCIAL FLYING LINKED WITH NATIONAL DEFENSE IN INTERVIEW

CINCINNATI, April 28.—The Cincinnati Enquirer says Elliott Roosevelt, son of the President, believes the aviation industry must be subsidized by the Government if it is to take its proper place in national defense.

Aviation editor of a group of newspapers, the President's son made his comment in an interview during a brief stopover last night on a flight from Fort Worth to Washington.

"Commercial aviation must be considered in connection with national defense and must have Government aid if it is to play the role in national defense to which it is properly entitled."

Not only should airlines be subsidized, he contended, but the entire industry given financial help, even to part payment of pilots by the Government, with Government insurance and retirement rating.

SCARCITY OF CATTLE FEED IN WESTERN MINNESOTA

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD a telegram I have just received from Emil E. Holmes, who made a trip to Montevideo, Minn., last Saturday and makes a report in his telegram about the lack of feed for cattle in western Minnesota. I am glad to say that the Department of Agriculture informs me that it has made a grant to take care of Minnesota for the month of May, which will be in the hands of the Governor for distribution throughout the State as he sees fit. No doubt the situation can be remedied by applying to him.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MONTEVIDEO, MINN., April 28, 1934.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

Mass meeting of 1,000 farmers here today. I am petitioned by them to request that you take their cause on floor of Senate at once and also contact President Roosevelt. I am also told that their previous reports of conditions have been very much ignored. We find on check-up in country that many cattle have died and that before many more hours others will die. Needed at once to carry over 146,000 bushels oats and 5,000 barley, with same amount of wheat, 700 flax, grass seed 2,500, and 2,500 tons of hay of an eatable quality. Three carloads of hay in former shipment burned. Ten percent of this amount needed here within the next 60 hours, with balance forwarded without delay. The moan of the dying cattle and the plaintive bleat of the lamb raises a symphony of anguish that humanity cannot ignore further. Contact by wire, C. W. Olson, Montevideo, Minn., and mail me copy; also appeal to Associated Press to assist in carrying message to the people.

EMIL E. HOLMES.

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS—ADDRESS BY HENRY L. STIMSON

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a speech broadcast over the National Broadcasting network last evening by Hon. Henry L. Stimson, former Secretary of State, on the reciprocal trade-agreement policy of this administration.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICA MUST TRADE ABROAD TO PRESERVE HER NATIONAL WELFARE AND CHARACTER

The Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wallace, has recently performed a very distinct service in pointing out one of the major problems which lies before us in this country. In his pamphlet entitled "America Must Choose" he has clarified the agricultural dilemma which we are facing. He has pointed out how, during the war, 50,000,000 acres of European land which formerly helped to supply the people of Europe with food were left untilled owing to the great conflict; how the United States, in order to meet that market, had added 40,000,000 acres to our own cultivated land and speeded up our entire farm production; and how today, as a result of this, after Europe has resumed again its agricultural production, we have at least 40,000,000 acres of farm land which is unnecessary for our own food supply and which therefore cannot be profitably used unless we can somehow trade its crops with the outside world. He has further pointed out how, since the war, instead of bending all our energies to secure that foreign trade by which alone we could keep this acreage in profitable employment, we have even added to the tariff and other barriers which made such a development of trade difficult; and how these obstacles, coupled with the growth of nationalistic spirit in Europe which has tended to raise trade barriers everywhere, have reduced the great export trade which we formerly enjoyed from over five billions of dollars a year in 1929 to about a billion and a half in 1933. He asserts that as a result of this we are faced with the alternative today of either plowing under some 50,000,000 of acres and finding some other occupation for their owners, or of developing a very large volume of foreign trade which we have not now got.

Mr. Wallace frankly points out the dangers and difficulties which will lie before us if we adopt the former course—the compulsory government control of production and marketing not only in agriculture but in industry in order to reach a balanced nationalistic economy; the suppression of our hereditary initiative and love of freedom and, worst of all, the stifling of individual free thought and speech which is a necessary accompaniment of the process if we carry national planning to its full conclusion. I am very glad that he frankly announces his own distaste and opposition to such a process and that he evidently believes that we should try as far as possible to follow the other course—that of trying to restore our international trade.

For myself I have never been able to conjure up any real apprehension that the American people would be willing to carry through anything like a complete system of a planned national economy. It would be at variance with their deepest instincts and habits. It would result in violating the most fundamental tenets of their social and political beliefs. Conceivably they might drift into a revolution, but that revolution would never produce a planned economy. If it did, there would speedily be another revolution to end it. On such matters a man's faith is the result of the accumulated experiences of a lifetime rather than any deductions from study. My own faith goes back among other things to the experiences I gained when I accompanied 2,000,000 of my younger fellow citizens to Europe in the Great War and watched that telling demonstration of their natures and temperaments. Those men were not the material for the regimentation of any governmental bureaucracy. Even their military discipline was not so much a submission to authority as it was a zealous and eager cooperation toward the accomplishment of a great aim which they understood and believed in.

Their slogan, "Let's go", accurately described their spirit. They trespassed casually over the boundaries of No Man's Land with the same cheerful abandon with which their forefathers had trespassed over the hunting grounds of the Iroquois. After living with them and watching them, one realized fully that the old spirit still survived which had carried their race across the successive frontiers of this continent until they found themselves penned up against the boundaries of the Pacific Ocean. Such a race will not be satisfied with a walled-in territory, however ample. Their spirit of adventure will seek the outside world and, in default of more wilderness to conquer, will vent its commercial instincts in trading with and building up the other peoples of the earth. The chaotic situation of the world today is not a threat or a deterrent to such men but a challenge and an appeal to their initiative. They would refuse a planned economy, not because it was economy but because it was planned by others than themselves. They would reject a doctrine of national self-sufficiency, not because it was national but because it was insufficient for their spirit of adventure.

All artificial barriers to their enterprise would eventually fall as surely as did the walls of Jericho to the trumpets of Joshua. Put such a population in charge of an area like that of the United States with its matchless natural resources for manufacture on the one hand and on the other its unique geographical situation commanding the trade routes of two great oceans, and I believe that a development of commercial relations with the outside world will follow as naturally as sunrise follows night.

But it is asserted that the trend all over the world is toward nationalistic development and the suppression of all foreign trade, and that we alone cannot fight the prevailing current. I have recently had occasion, in some lectures in Princeton, to analyze these assertions in connection with the present economic situation in Europe. I have reached the conclusion that the chaotic situation there, which is at present so discouraging, is very largely the temporary result of the devastation of the Great War, occurring in a modern industrialized civilization, and that the present economic barriers which have recently grown up and almost destroyed international commerce in that continent will eventually be relieved and international trade to a substantial extent be restored. Indeed, I pointed out that very recently the process of restoration has already begun among certain countries of the southeastern portion of that continent. I believe that throughout the world we are all very naturally still confused by the succession of great problems which have been forced upon us during the past century and that we often mistake as permanent, conditions which are the result of temporary maladjustment. The use of steam and electricity, and the industrial revolution which has been based upon that use, has come with such comparative suddenness in the long, slow evolution of mankind that the results which it has wrought are not yet fully understood and appraised. It has completely transformed the civilization of Europe and of North America. It has brought into being populations which in some nations are much larger than could be supported on the land which they possess by agriculture alone, and which can thus only be supported by means of commerce with the rest of the world.

On top of this situation came the Great War in 1914—the first great war since this industrial transformation had taken place. It completely shattered Central Europe and it produced an economic dislocation throughout the world of an extent never before known, and from the effects of which we are now suffering. It would be surprising indeed if in such a novel and terrific situation men did not lose their bearings and their courage and jump to the conclusion that certain disastrous results were more permanent than was really the case.

I believe that the chaotic commercial situation which we see not only in Europe but all over the world, which has destroyed trade everywhere and is imposing almost daily new restrictions in the form not only of tariffs but of quotas and other arbitrary methods, is not a permanent growth. It certainly is not the necessary result of nationalism. A healthy nationalism is quite consistent with a healthy international commerce. The great post-war depression has unbalanced budgets and necessitated new revenues. Tariffs and restrictions have been applied as emergency remedies and very often the remedy has only increased the disease and the maladjustment.

Nevertheless certain indisputable facts stand out. One such fact is that there is a large surplus population in Europe to be fed and it probably cannot be fed permanently without the help of foreign trade. For example, in less than 50 years before the Great War Germany alone increased her population by nearly 30,000,000 people in reliance upon foreign trade to support them. She imported 20 percent of her food alone. The same thing was true in large degree of other portions of Europe. It has been estimated that the total European surplus population beyond the number which can be permanently supported by agriculture alone very nearly reaches 100,000,000. They simply must trade in order to live. Why should we not obtain a part of that great inevitable commerce? How enormously it would assist us in the present depressed condition of our own agriculture, not to say industry.

Take a situation nearer home. Until 5 years ago Canada was our greatest customer in all the world. She bought from us every year exports amounting to at least $800,000,000. Indeed, I am told that in 1929 these exports went nearly as high as 950 million. During the past 5 years those purchases have shrunk until in 1933 they amounted to only 210,000,000. Part of this shrinkage has been due to causes really arising out of the dislocations of the Great War. Much of it could be restored. A great commerce between two such similar nations as Canada and ourselves, with 3,000 miles of common boundary, friendly, of similar race, is natural and should exist. It will be a reproach to governmental initiative on both sides of the border if it is not restored.

The general principles which should guide the United States in her commercial relations with the rest of the world have throughout her history been consistent and well understood and have been dictated by her world position and the character of her people and their industries. She has endeavored to cultivate good will and confidence among the peoples of the earth and to promote those conditions of world peace upon which economic and political stability everywhere must ultimately rest. While seeking friendship with all, she has avoided discriminatory relations with any, whether economic or political. Her tariffs have been imposed by general laws enacted by her Congress and applying to all nations alike. The great variety of American products and the world-wide markets which they must seek have necessarily prescribed such an attitude.

But the temporary panic conditions which have grown up during the past 2 years and which are spreading throughout a large portion of the world have produced great changes in the trade conditions which we now face. Commerce between the nations today is chiefly governed by permanent tariff laws but by temporary restrictions of an entirely different character. Trade is being parceled out among frightened nations by quotas and other arbitrary systems of distribution which are being made and varied with great rapidity.

In such a world our Government today is at an almost hopeless disadvantage in its efforts to restore that measure of foreign trade which we must have if our prosperity is to return. A general revision of our tariff laws by Congress, which has been the ordinary method of our making, would be entirely ineffective to meet the situation which exists today. Anyone who has witnessed the course which such a congressional revision follows can appreciate that. It would be far too slow. It could not reach the many different specific problems arising and constantly changing in a great many different nations. In each of these other nations the power to handle their commercial relations is very differently organized from the way in which it is organized at present in our Government. They have vested far greater powers of initiative in their executives, and their executives can act with much greater promptness in an emergency than can be done by our Congress or even our Tariff Commission under our present laws.

In every parliamentary government, for example, the executive, in the shape of the prime minister and his cabinet, frames the tariff with a view to the national requirements, and its ratification by the parliament usually follows much as a matter of course. This is true even in ordinary tariff legislation by such governments. But during the present emergency their executives have been given much greater power in many cases, particularly in respect to quotas and other new forms of restricting imports.

To deal with a world so organized, our Government at present is at a hopeless disadvantage. A great scramble is going on for foreign trade among the nations. Each one is trying to hold what it can of its own commerce and at the same time to get all that it can of the commerce of others. Many of the steps which they take and the things which they do are arrangements dictated by emergencies of the present moment. But on the other hand, many of such arrangements may result in permanently fixing the channels of future trade, and at present owing to the faultiness of our machinery the United States is being shouldered out of those arrangements and left with the likelihood of permanently losing most of the foreign trade which otherwise it might and should get. That is not a pleasant situation for any American to look upon, least of all at such a time as this when it may have the effect of shaping our whole future domestic national policy as well as losing our foreign trade. I should not like to see my country driven into an attempt to live within its own borders without any foreign trade whatever, involving a system of bureaucratic planning at which our whole instincts and traditions revolt; involving a shifting of great masses of our people from their present occupations into other homes and other businesses; involving the discontinuance or operation on a lower scale of many of our great industries; and all just because we cannot organize our Government in an effective way to meet the great emergency. I think that would be an unjust reflection upon us. I think the emergency can and should be met.

There is a bill pending before the Congress which will give to the President for a certain limited time the power under careful restrictions to meet the emergency and to enter into agreements with foreign governments as to foreign trade; and, for the purpose of expanding our foreign markets, to make limited changes in our existing tariff duties or other import restrictions. I think that some such legislation should be promptly passed to meet the emergency which confronts us. I am not impressed with the objection that it would give undue or dictatorial powers to our Executive. It does not seem to me that such objections are well founded. The legislation is for the purpose of meeting temporarily an emergent situation. I see no reason to believe it will be abused. I do not think it impossible to enact such legislation in a form which will conform to the limitations of our Constitution, and under which agreements can be negotiated without violating our present most-favored-nation treaties.

I remember that a similar objection that it would unduly increase the power of the Executive was made when we first proposed to adopt in the American Governments, both State and national, the form of the Executive budget, and to allow the President and the governors of States to propose to Congress and the various legislatures the annual programs of their future expenditures. For nearly 130 years we had stumbled along with the waste and extravagance of the old lack of system but finally the change was made, and today we see the executive budget working in the Federal Government and in the governments of nearly all of the States without any impairment of constitutional liberty whatever. While the situations are not exactly parallel, I believe that the same rules of common sense which controlled in the former case should control us now.

It was Alexander Hamilton who, in his report on manufactures on December 5, 1791, marked out the great principles upon which the regulation of foreign commerce should be carried out by this Government in the interest of its national development. His principles have stood as a guidance ever since for anyone who desires a clear, frank, and intelligent exposition of national policy in such matters. I believe that the same principles of national interest which he set forth in that report would support us now in taking the steps which I have discussed to meet the present national emergency. Unless some such steps are taken to revive our foreign trade, there is serious danger that we may drift into a domestic situation where attempts may be made radically to modify the individual rights of freedom and of initiative under which we have so long lived.

ADMINISTRATION OF POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—ADDRESS BY POSTMASTER GENERAL FARLEY

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech by the Honorable James A. Farley, Postmaster General, in dedicating the new Federal Building in St. Louis, on Saturday, April 28, 1934.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, it is a privilege to join with you today in the laying of the cornerstone of your new Federal building. Long may it remain here to be viewed by your children and your children's children as a symbol of their Government and as a memorial of the part their fathers and mothers took in making Missouri one of the strongest links in the chain of States that binds together our mighty Republic.

It is of added interest to me that in this magnificent new building, which is adequate to house all Federal activities of St. Louis under one roof, there will be the second largest post-office facility in St. Louis, which facility, located in the heart of the business section of your great city, will give it the best possible postal service.

It is a pleasure for me to appear on this program with your able mayor, Hon. Bernard F. Dickmann; your efficient postmaster, Mr. W. Rufus Jackson; and with the construction engineer for the Treasury Department, Mr. Jesse I. Marshall. I congratulate Mauran, Russell & Crowell, the local architects who planned this magnificent building, and N. P. Severin Co., the Chicago contractors who created it.

I also desire to pay a tribute of respect to the workmen and laborers who, by their untiring efforts, made possible the construction of this beautiful edifice.

This building is another development in the great civic memorial plaza plan. When this plan is completed St. Louis will have one of the finest and most imposing groups of public buildings in the country.

When St. Louis was first settled there were no post offices on the west side of the Mississippi River. Correspondence between officials was by courier, and there was not much of that. An irregular line of messengers carried communications between the fur merchants and the Indian traders in the West.

Every Missourian has a right to be proud of the history and heritage of his great State. Here came the dauntless explorers of France, England, and Spain and made their homes; here came the courageous and high-spirited Germans and Irish seeking political freedom; and here came the valiant Virginians and Kentuckians, the intelligent and thrifty New Englanders, and the chivalrous and gentle sons and daughters of the South, to found a great and truly American city.

Of all these people, none made a stronger and more lasting imprint on the life, manners, and customs of St. Louis than did the industrious, loyal, and cultured Germans. Their industry, their fidelity, their art, and their literature have contributed largely to the city's growth and greatness. In the new land devoted German mothers made happy homes and were the inspiration of their husbands and children. The German influence was lasting and America has reaped the benefit.

Missouri was long the outpost and frontier of civilization. From the time of its inclusion in the United States in 1803, under the direction and wise planning of that great apostle of the rights of the people, Thomas Jefferson, her citizens have ever been foremost on the field and in the forum as the defenders of the liberties of the people.

Her strategic location as a frontier State in the early days, her border-line position in the days before and during the War between the States, and the solid American character of her people have always caused the citizens of Missouri to be keenly alive to every question that affected the welfare of the country. The city of St. Louis, as the metropolis of the great Southwest, has been the gathering point of men and women with a virility of mind and body unsurpassed anywhere in the country.

Mark Twain made us all children of Missouri. During my boyhood days I often, in imagination, joined Tom Sawyer and Huckleberry Finn in their play and escapades. Life on the Mississippi became real when you saw it through Mark Twain's eyes.

The names and exploits of your explorers and first settlers—De Soto, Marquette, La Salle, La Clede, Choteau, Daniel Boone, Lewis, Clarke, O'Fallon, Fitzpatrick, and many others—have made your history a living memorial to pioneer courage and an inspiration for future generations.

One of the brightest pages in diplomatic history is the story of the acquisition of this magnificant valley from France by that great Democrat, Thomas Jefferson. His policies in foreign affairs are still a safe guide, and it is well to think of how he expressed them in his first inaugural address. Let us hear them once more:

"Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political; peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none."

These are the policies laid down by Jefferson, and they are the policies which now make this Government loved at home and respected abroad under the wise administration and able leadership of Jefferson's great successor, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The story of Missouri is replete with the history of its men who to this day have been true to the principles of Jefferson. A noble and militant aggressiveness has always been a characteristic of your statesmen and journalists. Your first Senator, Thomas H. Benton, whose historical work "Thirty Years View", is still the best account of Congressional activities from 1821 to 1856, was such a man. His friendship for President Jackson, his work in opening up the West, and his career as a soldier and journalist make him worthy of the honor you accord him.

Coming down to a later date we find that great lawyer, college president, legislator, and true Jeffersonian, Champ Clark, dominating the national scene. And now we see Bennett Champ Clark, the worthy son of a worthy sire, keeping alive, as parliamentarian, lawyer, soldier, author, and United States Senator, the fame of his father and of his State.

Your State has given to the country numerous outstanding statesmen, such as the eloquent Vest, Cockrell, Stone, Bland, Hawes, and Reed, and many others whom time will not permit me to mention by name. I also wish to refer to that renowned publisher, Joseph Pulitzer, who came to my home city from St. Louis; those great leaders, Carl Schurz and Blair; Eugene Field and Mark Twain, of literary fame; and Eads and Allen, outstanding in the engineering world and in the field of philanthropy. I know that every true Missourian is thrilled by the immortal records of Gen. John J. Pershing, who so masterfully led the American forces in the World War, and of Admiral Robert E. Coontz, ranking naval officer and chief of operations during that great conflict.

Permit me to revert again to the Post Office Department, which I have the honor to head. Our records in Washington show that the first post office was established in St. Louis on October 3, 1804, during the administration of Thomas Jefferson. This was when your city was a part of the Louisiana Territory.

Rufus Easton was your first postmaster, and later he had the honor of being the second Delegate to represent Missouri Territory in the Congress, taking his seat on November 16, 1814. Including Mr. Easton, you have had 30 postmasters.

While I am on this subject, there are two men from your State to whom I wish to pay a personal tribute; one because he was an able official of the Post Office Department, the other because he is one of the most courageous friends of the administration.

In the Post Office Department the name of Alexander M. Dockery, Third Assistant Postmaster General from 1913 to 1921, under President Woodrow Wilson, is respected and revered. He spent nearly half a century in public life. As a Democratic leader, a Member of Congress, Governor of Missouri, Masonic grand master for the State of Missouri, an orator, and gentleman, he achieved a merited fame. In 1893 he was chairman of the congressional committee composed of Senators Cullom, Jones, and Cockrell, and Representatives Dingley and Richardson, which revised the financial accounting system of the Government.

Government accounting is still conducted to a large degree under the so-called "Dockery Act." He was a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and secured the establishment of the first fast express mail between New York, St. Louis, and Kansas City. He also had charge of the legislation and secured the passage of the act establishing the special-delivery service, which was approved by President Cleveland August 4, 1886. The revenue from this class of mail during the last fiscal year amounted to $7,018,094. In his old age he retained a vigor of mind, a continued devotion to public service, and a charm of manner that is well remembered by all who knew him.

The other person to whom I wish to pay tribute is from your own city. As a Congressman no one works more intelligently or more devotedly than he for the interests of his city and State. His interests, however, are not bounded by city and State lines. He has always placed his country's good above his personal friendships and his personal advantage. Foremost in every fight for the people's rights, he is loved by all who are alined with him in this battle and respected and feared by those who are not. I refer to the Honorable JOHN J. COCHRAN, your Representative in Congress, of whom you may well be proud. I wish that time permitted me to go on to say all the good things I might say of the other men and women of Missouri, both in public and private life, who so well deserve your approbation. However, I do want to express my deepest appreciation to Congressman CLAIBORNE and each Member of Congress from your State for whatever they have done to aid the administration of President Roosevelt.

My friends, it is good to get away from Washington and meet face to face the men and women who support the Government and whose thoughts seem to be not what they can get out of it but what they can do to aid it.

It is to you to whom the appeal must be made against the insidious tactics of organized minorities and special interests who endeavor to mislead the judgment of legislators and direct public opinion. It is surprising to see how a few adroit and resourceful men can often create artificial sentiment and circumvent the interests of the people for their own personal profit.

When one notes the powerful influences brought to bear for selfish purposes and then looks about to find someone speaking in the public interest, demanding retrenchment, economy, and elimination of waste, he finds there is no lobby for this purpose and that, so far as the people generally are concerned, they often have difficulty in making themselves heard.

When, for instance, I suggest a desire to wipe out the deficit in the Postal Service, as I hope to do, it is most surprising to find the amount of advice I receive from special interests telling me that the way to become a popular Postmaster General is to spend, and not save, the people's money.

During the fiscal year 1932—the year before the present administration took charge—the deficit in the Postal Service reached the stupendous sum of $152,246,188. This was over and above the revenues derived by the Post Office Department, and had to be paid out of the General Treasury, which means that the taxpayers of the country had to provide the money to cover the deficit.

While it has been necessary during the past year to effect many economies in order to keep the Department's expenditures within its Budget requirements, improvement in general business conditions has brought an increase in postal revenues and it has been possible to eliminate some of the more drastic economies. Payless furloughs will end on May 1 and various curtailed services will be restored.

The policy of this administration is to give a better postal service at a less cost. We have taken stock, have put the house in order, and every effort will be made to continue to improve and increase the postal facilities commensurate with public needs.

It has been most pleasing to me to note the consideration of the public, and the cooperation of the rank and file of postal employees while curtailed service was effective and economies were being made in costs of operations. The increasing interest of the people in the costs and quality of the Postal Service is most reassuring.

While my first duty is to the taxpaying public, I am not unmindful of the interests of the approximately 235,000 employees in the Postal Service. It is my desire to have the salaries of these trained men and women so adequate and their working conditions so congenial that service under the Post Office Department will attract and bring to it men and women of the very highest type.

Recently much has been said about the annulment of the air-mail contracts. These contracts were annulled because they were illegal and fraudulent and were costing the Government millions of dollars in excess of a proper payment for the service rendered.

There is evidence that these contracts were the result of collusion and fraud and that they were awarded without actual competitive bidding and as the result of an unlawful conspiracy. The law is perfectly plain. Air-mail contracts, like other governmental contracts, should be awarded as a result of competitive bidding.

Air-mail contracts had been so manipulated that three large aviation corporations—the United Aircraft & Transport Co., the Aviation Corporation of Delaware, and the North American Aviation Co.—controlled about 92 percent of the entire air-mail business through associates, subsidiaries, and affiliates.

Evidence conclusively shows that the 1930 conferences were held and that at these conferences the air-mail business of the country was divided up among the contractors with the participation and approval of former Postmaster General Walter F. Brown. These conferences were held in an office adjoining that of the Postmaster General and written minutes were kept of the proceedings. Copies of these minutes in the possession of the Post Office Department reveal that one of the principal objectives was to avoid competitive bidding, which was clearly in violation of the law.

The minutes quote several of those in attendance as saying that they desired to avoid competitive bidding. Referring to a suggestion made to the conference by former Postmaster General Brown, William Mayo, representing Southwest Air Fast Express, and Erle Halliburton are quoted in the minutes as having said: "I think the suggestion is a good one rather than to have competitive bidding."

Ted Clark, representing Southwest Air Fast Express, and Erle Halliburton said: "I would prefer the plan suggested rather than competitive bidding."

Lou Holland, representing United States Airways, remarked: "I think it should be worked out by agreement, as I am afraid that competitive bidding will result in wild promotions."

Harris Hanshue, representing Western Air Express, Inc., said: "We are willing to do anything within reason to work out the plan rather than to go into competitive bidding."

These expressions from those participating make it perfectly evident that the one particular thing desired was to get around the law requiring competitive bidding, and they did act in defiance of the law.

At these conferences the routes were actually laid out and it was decided who should get such routes.

All of the above facts are not only in writing, but the representatives of a number of the air-mail companies have admitted the facts under oath before the Senate investigating committee.

As an illustration of collusion and stifled competition I cite the evidence before the Senate investigating committee sworn to by representatives of the air-mail companies, which shows that a contract was made between Erle P. Halliburton and American Airways, and between American Airways and Transcontinental Air Transport and Western Air Express, whereby a pot was made up to $1,400,000 which was to be paid to Halliburton's company for its assets. Sworn evidence shows these assets to be worth between four hundred thousand and seven hundred thousand dollars. Postmaster General Brown knew of this arrangement, insisted upon it, and, in fact, there has been evidence produced that the other big company, United Aircraft & Transport Co., was asked to donate $500,000 toward the funds to buy Halliburton out. At any rate, the contract was awarded to Halliburton's company and another at 68 cents per mile. The American Airways bought Halliburton's company and, by reason of its ownership of the two bidding companies, held this contract when the contracts were annulled. Halliburton got his $1,400,000, and it was paid under the terms of a written agreement by the American Airways and the Transcontinental & Western Air interests. The only thing these companies got from Halliburton was the contract and some equipment worth far less than $1,400,000.

Let me cite another instance which is revealed by the official records: There were two bids on the route from New York to Los Angeles via St. Louis and Kansas City. One of these was a joint bid by the Transcontinental Air Transport and the Western Air Express; the other by a combination of three companies, which called their merger the United Avigation Co. The latter bid 64 percent of the maximum limit set by the Post Office Department. The other combination bid 97½ percent. The higher bid was accepted, and it cost the Government more than two and one half million dollars, that being the difference between the high and the low bid.

It is the duty of a Government official to promptly repudiate and annul a fraudulent contract, and this has been done by Government officials in hundreds of cases.

What would an individual do when he found he had signed a fraudulent contract and was being systematically defrauded? Would he continue to operate under the contract or would he promptly repudiate it and say: "I refuse to be defrauded any further. I repudiate this contract. It is illegal and fraudulent and I will pay you no more money." Under such circumstances is the Government of the United States in any different position than that of an individual? Is it not the duty of an official of the Government to protect the public interest and to prevent a perpetration of a fraud upon the taxpayers?

Sworn testimony before the Senate investigating committee shows that astounding profits were made on stock promotions of aviation companies based on air-mail contracts. William E. Boeing has testified that the Boeing Air Transport Co. was organized with a common capital stock of $750 and that its net income for the year 1930 was approximately $1,500,000, made exclusively from an air-mail contract with the Post Office Department. This company paid dividends of $5,500,000 on this capital of $750 from 1928 to 1932, inclusive, all from air-mail contracts. Boeing further claims to have invested $259.14 in the Boeing Air Transport Co. and said that he had about $400,000 in stock invested in different aviation companies which went into the United Aircraft & Transport Co. The original company was merged with United, and Boeing testifield that in May 1929 stock which had been given him had a value of approximately $51,500,000 on the market.

The Pratt-Whitney Aircraft Co. was organized with a capital stock of $1,000 for the purpose of manufacturing aircraft and went into the United Aircraft & Transport System. It made a profit of 81.07 percent on all engines sold to the Government in 1930, and during the past 5 years this concern paid dividends of more than $12,000,000 on the original capital of $1,000.

The promoters of these aviation companies organized pools for selling their stock to the public and paid themselves enormous salaries and stock dividends when they had little or no capital invested and knew nothing whatscever about aviation. For instance, Fred B. Rentscheler of the Pratt-Whitney Co. testified that he invested $253 and that his stock of the United Aircraft & Transport Co. was worth $35,575,848 in 1929. He actually received in cash more than $9,500,000 and has 60,000 shares of stock left, these millions all being made from an investment of $253. From 1927 to 1933 Mr. Rentscheler was paid more than $1,500,000 additional as salary and bonus. His associates all fared as well, George W. Mead having invested $207 and secured stock of the value of $29,000,000 in 1929 and actually cashed out approximately $7,500,000. He had left 35,000 shares of stock besides his enormous salary and dividends.

An investment of $40 netted Charles W. Deeds of the Pratt-Whitney Co. stock valued at $5,624,640, and he has actually received more than $1,000,000 in cash besides his fat salary and dividends.

As a result of the annulment of the air-mail contracts there will result a better and a much more economical air-mail service. All new contracts will be let in compliance with the law, which now requires competitive bidding.

On April 20 bids were opened for 17 routes and these bids averaged a fraction over 28 cents per airplane-mile as compared with an average of 37 cents per airplane-mile paid under the annulled contracts. Bids on four additional routes were opened on Friday, and within a few days advertisements will be issued for bids on several other routes.

When all of the contracts are let, which will probably be within the next 30 days, there will be approximately 26,500 route-miles in the air-mail system as compared with 25,248 before the contracts were annulled.

If bids on the remainder of the routes do not run higher than the average on those opened on April 20, air-mail service over the approximately 26,500 route-miles in the new system will cost several million dollars less than did the service over the 25,248 miles of the old system and much new territory will be served. In the year 1932, before the present administration took office, the air mail cost the people of the United States approximately $20,000,000. We confidently expect to give more, better, and safer service for less than half this amount.

In conclusion, my friends, I want you to know that I have sincerely enjoyed your kindness and your hospitality. It is good to be with you. But more than that, I enjoy knowing that I can come to St. Louis and find we are one in heart, in mind, and in spirit with our courageous and heroic President as he valiantly leads us in the battle for human rights. One by one he has surmounted the obstacles, until now men and women in all walks of life have become imbued with his own brave and daring spirit, a spirit which never falters no matter how the clouds darken and the thunders shake the very foundations of the Government and society. Let us continue steadfastly with him until every man and woman and child in the country has every opportunity to live a contented and prosperous life so far as a just government is able to aid them in securing these blessings.

RADIO STATIONS IN MEXICO

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the Washington Star of April 29, 1934, describing the manner in which the Mexican Government has permitted the establishment of radio stations using the same frequencies as those in the United States.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

MEXICO THREATENS JUMBLE ON RADIO—MANY STATIONS REASSIGNED TO CHANNELS HELD BY AMERICAN NETS

By Sol Taishoff

Threatening a new intercontinental radio jumble, Mexico has ordered a sweeping reallocation of the wave-length assignments of its 60 broadcasting stations, placing the bulk of the stations on channels heretofore assigned exclusively to the United States.

Word of the shift, obtained officially last week from the Mexican communications authorities, was received at the Federal Radio

Commission with some concern. Although promulgated to become effective April 7, no technical reports have yet been received as to the extent of interference being caused, although engineers maintain that clashing of signals is inevitable in many cases, since the Mexican stations are "squatting" on the precise channels allocated to more than 100 United States stations.

The radio bombardment from across the southern border has presented a grave problem in North America for several years. Mexico has no broadcasting channels regularly assigned to it, because it has been unable to reach an agreement with the United States and Canada as to how the available bands should be divided among the nations of the continent. The last effort for the redistribution was made at a conference in Mexico City last summer, but it proved a fiasco when Mexico demanded considerably more channels than its northern neighbors were willing to relinquish.

DODGE CANADIAN CHANNELS

The Mexican communications ministry said in connection with the new allocations that they were designed to eliminate interference between Mexican stations and also to curtail the amount of disturbance with stations in other countries.

One disturbing factor gleaned from the new allocations log—the disclosure that Mexico is using only one of the exclusive waves assigned to Canada, whereas it formerly used a half dozen. All told, it has assigned stations on 38 of the 96 channels available in the broadcast band, but the bulk of the 60 stations are in the low-power category and probably will not cause any substantial degree of interference.

On 19 of the same 35 clear channels at the disposal of the United States for the exclusive use of high-power stations Mexico has assigned stations. Since the whole theory of a clear channel is that of exclusive use by a high-power station during evening hours, it means that the operation of the Mexican stations on these waves, irrespective of power, will curb their service in some degree. The only station of more than 1,000 watts assigned to a United States clear channel under the new allocations is XEMO, at Tia Juana, assigned to the 860-kilocycle channel with 2,500 watts. That is the wave used by WABC, New York key of the Columbia Broadcasting System.

UNITED STATES COUNTERPARTS

Other clear-channel stations which have comparatively low-powered Mexican stations assigned on their waves include: KFI, Los Angeles; WEAF, N.B.C. key, New York; WOR, Newark; WGN, Chicago; WSB, Atlanta; WJR, Detroit; WCCO, Minneapolis; WHAS, Louisville; KWKH, Shreveport; and WWL, New Orleans divide time on same channel); KJR, Seattle; KDKA, Pittsburgh; KYW, Chicago; KTHS, Hot Springs; and KRLD, Dallas (share time); WBT, Charlotte; WPG, Atlantic City; and WLWL, New York (share time); KSL, Salt Lake City; WWVA, Wheeling; and WOWO, Fort Wayne (share time); and KOB, Albuquerque, N.Mex., and KEX, Portland, Oreg. (share time).

The Mexican shift discloses that there are 10 stations among the 60 having power of 2,500 watts or more. While it is possible that some of the lower-powered stations will cause interference with stations in this country, by far the worst situations are expected to result from the high-power outlets. The biggest of the group is XENT, at Nuevo Laredo, just across the border from Laredo, Tex., which is licensed for 150,000 watts, or three times the highest power regularly used by any American station. Assigned to the 1,340-kilocycle channel, it will operate simultaneously with these American stations on the wave: WSPD, Toledo; WFEA, Manchester, N.H.; WCOA, Pensacola; KGNO, Dodge City, Kans.; KGDY, Huron, S.Dak.; and KFPY, Spokane.

With 50,000 watts power are two stations—XEPN, Piadras Negras, close to the Texas border, and XEW, in Mexico City. The former has been assigned to 590 kilocycles, a United States regional chanel on which operate WEEI, Boston; WOW, Omaha; WKZO, Kalamazoo; and KHQ, Spokane. XEW is assigned to the 890 kilocycle channel, a regional channel used by both United States and Canadian stations. Among the American stations on the wave are WMMN, Fairmont, W.Va.; KARK, Little Rock; WGST, Atlanta; WILL, Urbana, Ill.; KFNF, Shenandoah, Iowa; KUSD, Vermillion, S.Dak.; and KSEI, Pocatello, Idaho.

THREE 10,000 STATIONS

There are three 10,000-watt stations—XEYZ, Mexico City; XEAW, at Reynosa, just across the Rio Grande from Texas; and XEB, at Mexico City. The first is assigned to 760 kilocycles, a Canadian-shared wave, on which are the following American stations: WEAN, Providence; WTAR, Norfolk, Va.; WMC, Memphis, KELW, Burbank, Calif.; and KTM, Los Angeles.

XEAW is assigned to the 950-kilocycle channel, used by WRC, Washington; KMBC, Kansas City, KFWB, Hollywood; and KGHL, Billings, Mont. XEB is assigned to the Canadian-shared channel of 1,010 kilocycles, on which these American stations are assigned: WHN, New York; WNAD, Norman, Okla.; WIS, Columbia, S.C.; KGGF, Coffeyville, Kans.; and KQW, San Jose, Calif.

At Agua Caliente, just across the California line, the Mexican Government has assigned the 5,000-watt XEBC on the 1,280 kilocycle channel. This is a regional wave used by WORC, Worcester, Mass.; WCAP, Asbury Park, N.J.; WCAM, Camden, N.J.; WTNJ, Trenton, N.J.; WDOD, Chattanooga, Tenn.; WRR, Dallas; WIBA, Madison, Wis.; and KFBB, Great Falls, Mont.

XEFO, Mexico City, licensed for 5,000 watts, has been assigned to the 940-kilocycle channel, used in this country by WAAT, Jersey City; WAVE, Louisville; WDAY, Fargo, N.Dak.; WHA, Madison, Wis.; and KOIN, Portland, Oreg. The remaining big station—XEOK, Tia Juana—is of 2,500 watts and is assigned to the 920-kilocycle channel, used in this country by WWJ, Detroit; KPRC, Houston; WAAF, Chicago; KFEL and KFXF, Denver; and KOMO, Seattle.

The new allocations do not account for station XER, the 500,000 watter which had operated from Villa Acuna, across the border from Del Rio, Tex., for 2 years. Licensed to Dr. John R. Brinkley, deposed Kansas medico-broadcaster, the station was forcibly closed by the Mexican authorities 2 months ago because of the objectionable medical broadcasts by Brinkley. This station, due to its high power, was the cause of most of the complaints from American stations about interference.

MUNICIPAL DEBT READJUSTMENT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5950) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, House bill 5950 which is now before the Senate is exceedingly important to hundreds of American municipalities and other taxing districts, and those to whom they are indebted. The purpose of the bill is to add a new chapter to our existing bankruptcy law. The necessity for this addition is indicated by the following declaration of policy which appears as an introduction to the bill:

> There is hereby found, determined, and declared to exist a national emergency caused by increasing financial difficulties of many local governmental units, which renders imperative the further exercise of the bankruptcy powers of the Congress of the United States.

Let us briefly consider some of the important factors of which the emergency mentioned in the bill consists:

The American people owe approximately $285,000,000,000. Our local governmental debts amount to almost $20,000,000,000. The greater part of this indebtedness was contracted upon the assumption and in the belief that it would be paid from assets and incomes similar to those which generally prevailed prior to the beginning of the Nation-wide panic which occurred in 1929. But the assumptions of 5 years ago regarding ability to pay debts have been annihilated, and all beliefs concerning the matter have been disappointed beyond power of expression.

Our national income in 1929 was $85,000,000,000; in 1930 it was $71,000,000,000; in 1931 it was $55,000,000,000; in 1932 it was $37,500,000,000; and in 1933 it is estimated to have been $30,000,000,000.

To require debtors in 1934 to discharge their obligations on a basis of payment determined in 1929 is similar in effect to requiring a wage earner to pay as large a monthly installment from a salary of $30 a month as he was previously required to pay from a monthly salary of $85.

It is estimated that since 1929 approximately $124,000,000,000 of this country's taxable wealth has been destroyed.

This country's worst depression has during the last 5 years made it impossible not only for individuals but for hundreds of cities, towns, and other taxing districts to meet their obligations which were contracted before the depression began.

On the 24th day of November 1933 1,650 cities, towns, or other taxing districts in the United States were in default in the payment of their obligations. These defaulting taxing districts are distributed throughout the Nation as follows:

Florida	323
North Carolina	264
Ohio	110
Texas	99
California	99
New Jersey	94
Tennessee	57
Michigan	57
Arkansas	57
Illinois	51
Kentucky	42
Missouri	42
Oregon	34
Idaho	28
Louisiana	26
Colorado	25
Oklahoma	24
Mississippi	23
Indiana	21
Washington	21
South Carolina	17
South Dakota	17
Iowa	13
Arizona	13
Alabama	12
Pennsylvania	11
Utah	9
Nebraska	9
North Dakota	8
Montana	8
New Mexico	7
Wisconsin	6
Georgia	6
Kansas	5
Minnesota	5
Wyoming	5
New York	4
Virginia	2
Connecticut	2
Nevada	2
Maine	1
Massachusetts	1

From the 24th day of November 1933 to the 30th day of January 1934 the defaulting municipalities and other taxing districts increased from 1,650 to 2,019. In other words, during the period just mentioned additional defaults occurred at the rate of more than 150 a month.

It has been impossible to obtain accurate information as to the number of defaults that have occurred since the 30th day of January.

The assessed valuation of the taxable property in a certain city in the United States in 1929 was $100,000,000. In 1933 the assessed valuation of the same city's property was $19,000,000. In this case it would be necessary for the city to increase its tax rate more than 400 percent in order to make payments on its outstanding indebtedness equal to the payments which it made in the year 1929.

There are now outstanding municipal bonds of the par value of more than $2,000,000,000, which were in default as to the payment of their principal, or the interest thereon, or both, on the 30th day of last January.

In the year 1929, 48,000,000 people in the United States were lucratively employed. Subsequent to 1929 approximately 15,000,000 of these, without fault on their part, became idle. Many millions of the latter became destitute, and consequently lost their ability to pay taxes. At one particular time during the last 4 years 17,000,000 people were supported by welfare organizations, which were financed largely by local taxation.

Thus taxing districts have been ground by the upper millstone of increasing demands for revenue and the nether millstone of decreasing ability to collect taxes. As the result of the accumulated misfortunes which we have indicated, the financial affairs of thousands of taxing districts, which are encumbered with outstanding bonds, are now in a chaotic condition.

In many cases the holders of these bonds have instituted, and are still instituting, mandamus proceedings against the defaulting taxing districts to compel them to levy more and more taxes in order to discharge their obligations which were contracted in circumstances which are wholly dissimilar to the distressing conditions which now prevail. The effects of this litigation are to increase the burdens and add to the embarrassment of the defaulting taxing districts which cannot possibly pay their debts according to the letter of the contracts which attest them.

In a case mentioned in the record a certain person purchased bonds of a defaulting taxing district of the par value of $5,000 for the sum of $450. The purchaser then instituted a mandamus proceeding against the defaulting district to compel it to levy a sufficient tax to pay the full par value of his bonds. Unfortunately, there is no existing law under which proceedings of this nature can be prevented, or by virtue of which defaulting districts can escape from their prosecutors.

In many instances defaulting districts and creditors holding more than 90 percent of their outstanding obligations have agreed upon plans of readjustment by virtue of which all the principal of the outstanding debt could be eventually satisfied, and a reasonable rate of interest could be paid on such obligations.

But in almost every such case the owners of a small fraction of the defaulting district's obligations have insisted upon the full payment of their claims in strict accordance with the harsh and now impossible terms upon which payment was originally promised.

For the purpose of enabling distressed, defaulting cities and other taxing districts and the owners of the greater part of the obligations of such defaulting concerns to enforce reasonable plans of adjustment upon which they may agree, in order that such defaulting taxing districts may ultimately satisfy all just demands against them, the House has passed the bill which is now before us and which it is hoped will soon be enacted into law.

The bill, when amended by the McCarran substitute, as it apparently will be, provides neither moratorium nor repudiation. What it does provide is as follows:

Any distressed taxing district may file a petition in a court of bankruptcy stating that it is insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature and that it desires to effect a plan of readjustment of its obligations. The petition shall state that a plan of readjustment is filed with it, and that the creditors of the taxing district owning not less than 51 percent in amount of the bonds, notes, or other evidence of the indebtedness of the taxing district affected by the plan, excluding certain obligations owned or controlled by the district in its own right, have accepted the plan in writing.

The petition shall be accompanied with the written acceptance and with a list of all known creditors of the taxing district, together with their addresses, so far as known, and descriptions of their respective claims. The petition shall also show the names and addresses of those who have accepted the plan of readjustment. The judge of the court in which the petition is filed shall enter an order either approving or disapproving it, in accordance with the merits or demerits of the case. If creditors holding 5 percent in amount of the obligations of the petitioning district shall, within 90 days after the first publication of the notice provided for in the bill, appear and controvert the facts alleged in the petition, the judge shall decide the issue thereby presented; and unless the material allegations of the petition are sustained, the petition shall be dismissed.

Upon approving the petition, or at any time thereafter, the judge shall require the taxing district to give such notice as he may deem proper to all creditors of the taxing concern, and cause publication of the notice to be made at least once a week for 3 successive weeks of a hearing to be held within 90 days after the approval of the petition for the purpose of considering the plan of readjustment filed with the petition, and any modification thereof which may be proposed.

The plan of readjustment shall not be confirmed in any case until it has been accepted, in writing, by or in behalf of creditors of the petitioner whose claims have been allowed, holding two thirds in amount of the claims of every class, which will be affected by the plan, and by creditors holding 75 percent in amount of the total claims against the taxing district affected by the plan. But it shall not be requisite to the confirmation of the plan that it be accepted by any creditor whose claim is not affected thereby, or by any creditor whose claim, under the plan, shall be paid in cash, in full.

After hearing any objections that may be made to the plan, the judge shall confirm it, if satisfied, first: That it is equitable and for the best interest of the creditors and does not unfairly discriminate in favor of any class thereof; second, that the plan complies with the provisions of subdivision B of the bill; third, that the plan has been accepted according to the provisions of the bill; fourth, that all amounts to be paid by the taxing district for services or expenses incident to the readjustment have been fully disclosed and that they are reasonable; fifth, that the offer of the plan and its acceptance are in good faith; and, sixth, that the taxing district is authorized by law, upon confirmation of the plan, to take all necessary action to carry it into effect.

Upon confirmation of the plan by the court, it shall be binding not only upon the taxing district but also upon all of its creditors, whether secured or unsecured.

If the judge disapproves the proposed plan, he shall file an opinion stating his reasons for such disapproval. If he approves it, the final decree shall be entered discharging the taxing district from all debts and liabilities dealt with in the plan, except as provided therein, and upon the entry of such decree the court's jurisdiction in the matter shall cease.

The bill specifically provides that nothing in it contained shall be construed to limit or impair the power of any State to control, by legislation or otherwise, any political subdivision thereof in the exercise of its political or governmental powers, including expenditures therefor, and including the power to require the approval by any governmental agency of the State of the filing of any petition and of any plan of adjustment authorized by the bill.

It is confidently believed by a majority of the members of the Committee on the Judiciary, including the distinguished chairman of the committee, Mr. ASHURST, that the enactment of this bill into law will prove highly beneficial not only to all the defaulting taxing districts of the country and their creditors but also to the public at large, by healing a financial malady that has proved to be as deadly as cancer, as contagious as scarlet fever, and as rapid in its progress as pneumonia.

Mr. McCARRAN. I wonder whether it would meet with the wishes of Senators generally, and of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], if I took up my proposed amendment, which is now on the table, and offered it by way of a substitute for the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire to have it read at this time?

Mr. McCARRAN. I think perchance it will be more comprehensible if read at this time, and I ask to have it read.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, before proceeding with the reading, may I say that it is my understanding that the amendment presented by the Senator from Nevada proposes to make a large number of verbal changes in the bill, the major number of them perhaps being designed to conform the bill to the three principal amendments which I described a few moments ago; and, for the convenience of the Senate, the amendment as drawn is presented in the nature of a substitute rather than as separate amendments?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes. There were so many clarifying expressions which were in conformity with the three major changes that I thought it best to offer the amendment as a substitute.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In addition to that, it condenses the original bill very substantially, but does not change the principle of it in any particular except in the particulars already referred to?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If the Senate should adopt the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, it would throw the whole matter into conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from Nevada wishes to have the amendment read at this time.

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the proposed amendment.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. Before the clerk reads, let me state that, to the best of my information, all who are in favor of this proposed legislation, including the members of the Committee on the Judiciary, who joined in the majority report, favor the McCarran amendment, which is in the nature of a substitute for the House bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield to me?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not want to interfere with the Senator's plan of procedure, but the text of his substitute is more or less technical, and I am very sure that the Senate would have a far better conception of it if he were to explain it, rather than to have it textually read at the desk.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am entirely content to follow either course, to insure the greatest clarification.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am sure the Senator could make it very much plainer than could the reading clerk from the text.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the reading will be dispensed with.

The amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That the act of July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", as approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto be, and they are hereby, amended by adding thereto a new chapter to read as follows:

"CHAPTER IX

"PROVISIONS FOR THE EMERGENCY TEMPORARY AID OF INSOLVENT PUBLIC DEBTORS AND TO PRESERVE THE ASSETS THEREOF, AND FOR OTHER RELATED PURPOSES

"SEC. 78. Declaration of policy.—There is hereby found, determined, and declared to exist a national emergency caused by increasing financial difficulties of many local governmental units, which renders imperative the further exercise of the bankruptcy powers of the Congress of the United States.

"SEC. 79. Additional jurisdiction.—Until the expiration of 2 years from the date this chapter takes effect, in addition to the jurisdiction exercised in voluntary and involuntary proceedings to adjudge persons bankrupt, courts of bankruptcy shall exercise original jurisdiction in proceedings for the relief of debtors, as provided in this chapter of this act.

"SEC. 80. Municipal-debt readjustments.—(a) Any municipality or other political subdivision of any State, including (but not hereby limiting the generality of the foregoing) any county, city, borough, village, parish, town, or township, unincorporated tax or special assessment district, and any school, drainage, irrigation, levee, sewer, or paving, sanitary, port, improvement or other district (hereinafter referred to as a 'taxing district'), may file a petition stating that the taxing district is insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature, and that it desires to effect a plan of readjustment of its debts. The petition shall be filed with the court in whose territorial jurisdiction the taxing district or the major part thereof is located. The petition shall be accompanied by payment to the clerk of a filing fee of $100, which shall be in addition to the fees required to be collected by the clerk under other chapters of this act. The petition shall state that a plan of readjustment has been prepared, is filed, and submitted with the petition, and that creditors of the taxing district owning not less than 51 percent in amount of the bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness of the taxing district affected by the plan, excluding bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness owned, held, or controlled by the taxing district in a fund or otherwise, have accepted it in writing. The petition shall be accompanied with such written acceptance and with a list of all known creditors of the taxing district, together with their addresses so far as known to the taxing district, and description of their respective claims showing separately those who have accepted the plan of readjustment, together with their separate addresses, if one is submitted with the petition, the contents of which list shall not constitute admissions by the taxing districts in a proceeding under this chapter or otherwise. Upon the filing of such a petition the judge shall enter an order either approving it as properly filed under this chapter, if satisfied that such petition complies with this chapter and has been filed in good faith, or dismissing it, if not so satisfied. If creditors holding 5 percent in amount of the bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness shall, within 90 days after the first publication of the notice provided for in subdivision (c), clause (1), of this chapter, appear, and controvert the facts alleged in the petition, the judge shall decide the issues presented, and unless the material allegations of the petition are sustained, shall dismiss the petition.

"(b) A plan of readjustment within the meaning of this chapter (1) shall include provisions modifying or altering the rights of creditors generally, or of any class of them, secured or unsecured, either through the issuance of new securities of any character or otherwise; and (2) may contain such other provisions and agreements, not inconsistent with this chapter, as the parties may desire.

"No creditor shall be deemed to be affected by any plan of readjustment unless the same shall affect his interests materially and adversely, and in case any controversy shall arise as to whether any creditor or class thereof shall or shall not be affected, the issue shall be determined by the judge after hearing upon notice to the parties interested.

"The term 'securities' shall include bonds, notes, and other evidences of indebtedness, either secured or unsecured, and certificates of beneficial interests in property. The term 'creditors' shall include for all purposes of this chapter all holders of claims, debts, securities, liens, or other interests of whatever character against the taxing district or its property or revenues, including claims under executory contracts and for future rent, whether or not such claims would otherwise constitute provable claims under this act, but excepting claims for salaries and wages of officers and employees of the taxing district.

"For all purposes of this chapter any creditor may act in person or by a duly authorized agent or committee. Where any committee, organization, group, or individual shall assume to act for or on behalf of creditors, such committee, organization, group, or individual shall first file with the court in which the proceeding is pending a list of the creditors represented by such committee, organization, group, or individual, together with a statement of the amount, class, and character of the indebtedness held by each such creditor, and shall accompany the same with a copy of the contract or agreement entered into between such committee, organization, group, or individual and the creditors represented by it or them, which contracts shall disclose all compensation to be received directly or indirectly by such agent or committee.

"(c) Upon approving the petition or at any time thereafter the judge (1) shall require the taxing district to give such notice as the order may direct to creditors, and to cause publication, to be made at least once a week for 3 successive weeks, of a hearing, to be held within 90 days after the approval of the petition for the purpose of considering the plan of readjustment filed with the petition and of any changes therein or modifications thereof which may be proposed; (2) if a plan of readjustment is not accepted and approved within such reasonable period as the judge may fix, or, if accepted and approved, is not confirmed, the judge may, after hearing, either extend such period not exceeding 1 year from the date of the filing of the petition, or dismiss the proceedings as the interests of the creditors may equitably require:

Provided, however, That if a plan shall not be accepted and approved within 1 year from the date of the filing of the petition, the judge, after hearing, may continue the proceeding for not exceeding 2 years from the date of the filing of the petition, with the written consent of creditors of the taxing district holding more than one half in amount of all claims affected by the plan; (3) shall require the taxing district at such time or times as the judge may direct, and in lieu of the schedules required by section 7 of this act, to file such schedules and submit such other information as may be necessary to disclose the conduct of the affairs of the taxing district and the fairness of any proposed plan; (4) shall determine a reasonable time and manner in which the claims and interests of creditors may be filed or evidenced, and, for the purposes of the plan and its acceptance, the division of creditors into classes according to the nature of their respective claims and interests; and may, for the purposes of such classification, classify as an unsecured claim the amount of any secured claim in excess of the value of the security thereof, such value to be determined in accordance with the provisions of chapter 57, clause (h), of this act; (5) may, with the authorized written approval of the taxing district, direct the rejection of contracts of the taxing district executory in whole or in part; (6) shall cause reasonable notice of such determination and of all hearings for the consideration of the proposed plan, or the dismissal of the proceedings, or the allowances of fees or expenses, to be given creditors by publication or otherwise; (7) may require the taxing district to open its books, records, and files to the inspection of any creditor of the taxing district during reasonable business hours; (8) may allow a reasonable compensation for the services rendered and reimbursement for the actual and necessary expenses incurred in connection with the proceeding and the payment of special masters, readjustment managers, and committees or other representatives of creditors of the taxing district, and the attorneys or agents of any of the foregoing; and appeals may be taken, from the orders making such allowances, to the circuit court of appeals for the circuit in which the proceeding under this chapter is pending, independently of other appeals which may be taken in the proceedings, and such appeals shall be heard summarily: Provided, however, That no fees, compensation, reimbursement, or other allowances for attorneys, agents, committees, or other representatives of creditors shall be assessed against the taxing district or paid from any revenues, property, or funds except in the manner and in such sums, if any, as may be provided for in the plan of readjustment; (9) in addition to the provisions of chapter II of this act for the staying of pending suits, the court may upon notice enjoin or stay until after final decree, the commencement or continuation of suits against the taxing district, or any officer or inhabitant of the taxing district, on account of the indebtedness of such taxing district, or to enforce any lien or to enforce levy of taxes for the payment of any such indebtedness: Provided, however, That the judge may enter an interlocutory decree providing that the plan shall be temporarily operative with respect to all indebtedness affected thereby and that the payment of the principal or interest, or both, of such indebtedness shall be temporarily postponed or extended or otherwise readjusted in the same manner and upon the same terms as if such plan had been finally confirmed and put into effect, and upon the entry of such decree the principal or interest, or both, of such indebtedness which has otherwise become due, or which would otherwise become due, shall not be or become due or payable, and the payment of all such indebtedness shall be postponed during the period in which such decree shall remain in force; and (10) may refer any matters to a special master, for consideration and report upon specified issues; but (11) shall not, by any order or decree, in the proceeding or otherwise, interfere with (a) any of the political or governmental powers of the taxing district, or (b) any of the property or revenues of the taxing district necessary in the opinion of the judge for essential governmental purposes, or (c) any income-producing property, unless the plan of readjustment so provides. The taxing district shall be heard on all questions. Any creditor shall be heard on the question of the proposed confirmation of the plan, and, upon filing a petition for leave to intervene, on such other questions arising in the proceeding as the judge shall determine.

"(d) The plan of readjustment shall not be confirmed until it has been accepted in writing, filed in the proceeding, by or on behalf of creditors whose claims have been allowed holding two thirds in amount of the claims of each class whose claims have been allowed and would be affected by the plan, and by creditors holding 75 percent in amount of the claims of all classes of the taxing district affected by the plan, but excluding claims owned, held, or controlled by a taxing district, and such plan has been accepted and approved by the taxing district in a writing filed in the proceeding, signed in its name by an authorized authority: Provided, however, That it shall not be requisite to the confirmation of the plan that there be such acceptance by any creditor or class of creditors (a) whose claims are not affected by the plan, or (b) if the plan makes provision for the payment of their claims in cash in full, or (c) if provision is made in the plan for the protection of the interests, claims, or liens of such creditors or class of creditors.

"(e) After hearing such objections as may be made to the plan, the judge shall confirm the plan if satisfied that (1) it is fair, equitable, and for the best interests of the creditors, and does not discriminate unfairly in favor of any class of creditors; (2) complies with the provisions of subdivision (b) of this chapter; (3) has been accepted and approved as required by the provisions of subdivision (d) of this chapter; (4) all amounts to be paid by the taxing district for services or expenses incident to the readjustment have been fully disclosed and are reasonable; (5) the offer of the plan and its acceptance are in good faith; and (6) the taxing district is authorized by law, upon confirmation of the plan, to take all action necessary to carry out the plan. Before a plan is confirmed, changes and modifications may be made therein, with the approval of the judge after hearing upon notice to creditors, subject to the right of any creditor who shall previously have accepted the plan to withdraw his acceptance, within a period to be fixed by the judge and after such notice as the judge may direct, if, in the opinion of the judge, the change or modification will be materially adverse to the interest of such creditor, and if any creditor having such right of withdrawal shall not withdraw within such period, he shall be deemed to have accepted the plan as changed or modified: Provided, however, That the plan as changed or modified shall comply with all the provisions of this subdivision.

"(f) Upon such confirmation the provisions of the plan and of the order of confirmation shall be binding upon (1) the taxing district, and (2) all creditors, secured or unsecured, whether or not affected by the plan, and whether or not their claims shall have been filed or evidenced, and if filed or evidenced, whether or not allowed, including creditors who have not, as well as those who have accepted it.

"(g) In the event the judge shall disapprove the plan he shall file an opinion stating his reasons for such disapproval. If he approve the plan, the final decree shall discharge the taxing district from those debts and liabilities dealt with in the plan except as provided in the plan; and upon the entry of such decree the jurisdiction of the court in such proceeding shall cease.

"(h) A certified copy of the final decree or of an order confirming a plan of readjustment, or of any other decree or order entered in a proceeding under this chapter, shall be evidence of the jurisdiction of the court, the regularity of the proceedings, and the fact that the decree or order was made. A certified copy of an order directing the transfer of any property dealt with by the plan shall be evidence of the transfer of title accordingly, and if recorded as conveyances are recorded shall impart the same notice that a deed, if recorded, would impart.

"(i) In proceedings under this chapter and consistent with the provisions thereof, the jurisdiction and powers of the court, the duties of the taxing district and the rights and liabilities of creditors, and of all persons with respect to the taxing district and its property, shall be the same as if a voluntary petition for adjudication had been filed and a decree of adjudication had been entered on the day when the petition of the taxing district was approved.

"(j) This chapter shall take effect and be in force from and after the date of the approval of this amendatory act and shall apply as fully to taxing districts and their creditors, whose interests or debts have been acquired or incurred prior to such date, as to taxing districts and their creditors, whose interests or debts are acquired or incurred after such date.

"(k) Nothing contained in this chapter shall be construed to limit or impair the power of any State to control, by legislation or otherwise, any political subdivision thereof in the exercise of its political or governmental powers, including expenditures therefor, and including the power to require the approval by any governmental agency of the State of the filing of any petition hereunder and of any plan of readjustment, and whenever there shall exist or shall hereafter be created under the law of any State any agency of such State authorized to exercise supervision or control over the fiscal affairs of all or any political subdivision thereof, and whenever such agency has assumed such supervision or control over any political subdivision, then no petition of such political subdivision may be received hereunder unless accompanied by the written approval of such agency, and no plan of readjustment shall be put into temporary effect or finally confirmed without the written approval of such agency of such plans.

"(l) If any provision of this chapter, or the application thereof to any person or circumstances, is held invalid, the remainder of the chapter, or the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in line with the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan, I feel that the Senate would get a better understanding of the bill if the Senator should explain it. However, I want to ask the Senator particularly as to whether the substitute retains the purposes and objects of the original bill?

Mr. McCARRAN. It retains substantially the objects of the original bill. It changes in three particulars the main points of the original bill. I will go hurriedly over it where it is the same.

The first paragraph, under chapter 9, on page 2 of the printed bill, is the same in the proposed substitute as in the original bill. The second paragraph is the same.

When we reach line 10, page 3, of the proposed substitute we find a change. The substitute reads:

The petition shall state that a plan of readjustment has been prepared, is filed and submitted with the petition, and that creditors of the taxing district owning not less than 51 percent in amount of the bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness of the taxing district affected by the plan, excluding bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness owned, held, or controlled by the taxing district in a fund or otherwise, have accepted it in writing.

In other words, if the district held taxing bonds, it should not count the bonds into the 51 percent, and they cannot be counted in. That raises the percentage from 30 percent, as fixed in the original bill, to 51 percent. In other words, the petition to bring the matter into motion in the first instance must have the backing of 51 percent of the outstanding obligees.

The substitute, as to section 80, on page 3, is the same as the original.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McCARRAN. Certainly. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. As I understand, the original bill provides that the municipality may file a petition, and institute proceedings in that way. The Senator's proposed substitute would require that a plan be agreed upon by some 51 percent of the outstanding obligees?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Before the petition could be presented?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. FLETCHER. And the plan must be submitted along with the petition?

Mr. McCARRAN. The plan must be a part of the petition, referred to in the petition, and filed with the petition.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. The only difference on that point, as I understand, is that the original bill required the consent of only 30 percent of the creditors?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. LOGAN. And in the Senator's proposed substitute the consent of 51 percent is required?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is a still further difference, which is that under the amendment of the Senator from Nevada a plan must be presented, with a certificate that the holders of 51 percent of the obligations concur in it, while under the original bill no plan need have been agreed upon at the time of the filing of the petition.

Mr. LOGAN. I think there must have been a plan agreed upon under the original bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No.

Mr. LOGAN. I think the original bill required 30 percent to have agreed upon a plan, and, if that be true, the only change is that the Senator from Nevada would require 51 percent.

Mr. McCARRAN. I have that part of the bill marked. I will read first the provision of the original bill. It provides as follows:

The petition shall be filed with the court in whose territorial jurisdiction the taxing district or the major part thereof is located. The petition shall be accompanied by payment to the clerk of a filing fee of $100, which shall be in addition to the fees required to be collected by the clerk under other chapters of this act. The petition shall state either (a) that creditors of the taxing district holding not less than 30 percent in amount of its bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness, excluding bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness owned, held, or controlled by the taxing district in a fund or otherwise, have consented in writing to the filing of the petition, signifying their willingness to have a plan of readjustment prepared and submitted to the court for confirmation.

Now, let me distinguish.

The petition shall state——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator is now reading the proposed amendment.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am reading now the proposed amendment.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand.

Mr. McCARRAN. The proposed amendment provides:

The petition shall state that a plan of readjustment has been prepared, is filed and submitted with the petition, and that creditors of the taxing district owning not less than 51 percent in amount of the bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness of the taxing district affected by the plan, excluding bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness owned, held, or controlled by the taxing district in a fund or otherwise, have accepted it in writing.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to ask the Senator whether the 51-percent provision applies only to the amount of the outstanding bonds, rather than to the number of people holding them?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to ask the Senator further whether it is or is not a fact that there might be a case where three or four banks would own 51 percent of a particular issue?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. In that case those three or four institutions would be able, without consultation with the other 49 percent of the holders of the bonds, to put into effect any plan they thought wise. Is that correct?

Mr. McCARRAN. Fifty-one percent in amount.

Mr. TYDINGS. I say, 51 percent of the amount, if that amount were held by three or four institutions, and that plan would be a plan binding upon the other 49 percent.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, the situation indicated by the Senator from Maryland could not possibly arise under the terms of this bill, because, as previously explained, the plan cannot be made effective unless the holders of at least 66⅔ percent of every class of security approve it; and before the court can confirm the plan it must have the approval of the holders of not less than 75 percent of the aggregate of the claims against the petitioning municipality or district.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true under either plan?

Mr. NEELY. No; only under the McCarran amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; that was not true under the original plan when the bill first came to the Senate. The original plan was that 30 percent of the holders of the aggregate number of claims could join with the municipality in taking the matter into court to have a plan prepared. Sixty-six and two thirds percent of the aggregate of the claims could have it confirmed. In addition to the check requiring 51 percent to join with the municipality in taking it into court there is also the requirement, as I thought had been made plain heretofore, that 66⅔ percent of each class of claims and 75 percent of the aggregate of the claims must agree before a plan may be put into effect.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, the Senator's amendment makes it necessary to have the plan approved by a certain percentage of holders before the court can take jurisdiction.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is a prerequisite to the court taking cognizance of the matter.

Mr. BORAH. What percentage is necessary to approve the plan?

Mr. McCARRAN. Fifty-one percent must come in with the proposed plan. Then after the matter goes through, 66⅔ percent of the various classes must adopt the plan, and finally before it becomes effective 75 percent of all the outstanding obligations must approve of the plan.

So we have, first of all, 51 percent to set the matter in motion in the court. The court, after the plan is brought in, may reject that plan, or he may set up a plan and send it back. Then if he does approve that plan, it is submitted to the holders, and if 66⅔ percent of each one of the outstanding classes of indebtedness approve it, and if 75 percent of all of the outstanding indebtedness approve it, it may become the effective plan.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator yield to permit me to ask another question?

Mr. McCARRAN. I am glad to do so.

Mr. BORAH. After the plan has gone to the court, approved by 51 percent, suppose the court approves the plan as submitted, then it is still necessary to have the approval of 66⅔ percent and ultimately of 75 percent before the plan can be accomplished?

Mr. McCARRAN. And more than that, there is another protecting clause in this substitute—I think it is in the original bill, but it is in the substitute, I know—that 5 percent may come in and petition to set aside the order even though the court approve the petition which 51 percent had approved. Five percent may come in and petition to set aside the order. Do I make myself clear?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator does.

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator yield for one other question?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Has the Senator any figures which will show what percentage of the number of persons of the average bond issue would be necessary in order to assemble the 51 percent of the actual amount of the bond issue as represented through holders of bonds?

Mr. McCARRAN. I have no figures bearing on that question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not think it would be possible, if the Senator from Nevada will permit me to make the statement, to obtain such figures without making a survey of practically all the obligations which are outstanding, because necessarily and unavoidably they vary in every case. No data are available. It would require a survey of the obligations of more than 2,000 municipalities alone, and perhaps an equal number of other taxing units which are affected by the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. My question is predicated upon the fact that quite often when bonds are sold one banking house will bid for the entire issue, and it will, in turn, resell it to its affiliates, which, in turn, will sell the bonds to their individual depositors. It occurred to me that probably from such figures it would be possible to hit some sort of a general rule concerning the number of the holders of approximately 51 percent of the amount of a bond issue. My original question was directed to the fact that a holding of 51 percent might be in the hands of only three or four people, who could take action to the exclusion of the others. However, the qualifying amendment seems to cover that contingency.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada further yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] understands that the proceeding under the terms of this bill, if it shall be enacted into law, will have relationship to almost every class of obligation, and the object of the principal provisions carried in the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada is to safeguard, in a measure, against the possibility which the Senator from Maryland has suggested. It is thought that if 51 percent of all the obligations be required to join in a plan before it is taken up by the court, and then that 66⅔ percent of the holders of each class of obligations, and also 75 percent of the obligations as a whole are required in approval, that this reasonably safeguards every interest that can be expected to be taken care of.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield for just one more question?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then, as I understand, the primary difference between the Neely bill and the McCarran bill, so-called——

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, there is no Neely bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. It is the committee bill. The primary difference between the committee bill and the McCarran amendment, as I understand, is that the McCarran amendment requires more interests to be considered in the adoption of any plan than does the committee bill.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is my judgment about it.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. When any plan is agreed upon then there is no discrimination at all in the operation of that plan so far as the creditors are concerned in each class, is there?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. LOGAN. Then, if 66⅔ percent, or two thirds of the creditors, shall agree upon a particular plan the minority creditors will receive exactly the same treatment as will the majority creditors?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada further yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Where there are, for example, a half dozen bond issues put out by a certain municipality, did the Senator, in answer to the question of the Senator from Kentucky, mean to say that each one of those bondholders would share equally as his interest might appear, regardless of the priority of the issue?

Mr. McCARRAN. They would share within their priority.

Mr. TYDINGS. Within their priority?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes.

Mr. NEELY. Will the Senator again yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. I invite the attention of the distinguished majority leader [Mr. ROBINSON] and the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]—both of whom have shown a great interest in this bill—to the following: Page 3 of the amendment says—

> The petition shall state that a plan of readjustment has been prepared, is filed, and submitted.

Beginning in line 23, on the same page, there is a clause which, apparently, does not make sense.

Mr. McCARRAN. Does the Senator mean the clause, "If one is submitted with the petition"?

Mr. NEELY. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. I think that ought to come out.

Mr. NEELY. I move to strike out the following language on page 3, lines 23 and 24: "if one [a plan] is submitted with the petition."

Mr. McCARRAN. I accept that amendment.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I also move to strike out of lines 13 and 15, on the same page, the word "or", and insert in lieu thereof the word "and."

Mr. McCARRAN. That puts it in the conjunctive rather than the disjunctive.

Mr. NEELY. Precisely. I believe that it was the intention of the committee, and, as I understand the measure as it came to the Senate from the House, it was the intention that that should be conjunctive instead of disjunctive language.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is, it should include all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think it would be well to let that go over for the present so that we may think about it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask one further question. Assume that 51 percent have agreed upon a plan; then the court has jurisdiction to act, and we will assume that the court approves the plan, and that ultimately it receives the approval of the full 75 percent which is ultimately required, may the court still reject the plan, and has it the power to do so if it sees fit?

Mr. McCARRAN. It would be my construction that the court could not after 75 percent have accepted the plan and after it has passed through each one of the stages. Fifty-one percent bringing it into the court, then 66⅔ percent of each class having approved it, then 75 percent of all having approved it, it then becomes an effective plan, but not until then.

Mr. BORAH. The question which I desire to present is whether there still rests with the court the discretion of rejecting the plan after 75 percent have approved it? If that is not true, if the court has no jurisdiction and discretionary power to reject it, if it sees fit, then, it seems to me that there is a very grave constitutional question involved. If the court still has jurisdiction to pass upon it, and determine it, and reject it, if it sees fit, then I should think that would eliminate the constitutional question.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. As I understand the bill, the court approves the plan in advance of its finally becoming effective, which is when 51 percent have approved the plan. Then the court enters a judgment, which is contingent and depends upon their getting 66⅔ percent of each class and 75 percent of all; and when that has been done the court does not have to enter another judgment. The only thing it will then be necessary for the court to do will be to determine whether the provisions of the previous judgment of approval have been complied with. That is my understanding.

Mr. McCARRAN. And that all the terms and conditions of the plan and orders of the court have been complied with.

Mr. LOGAN. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. If that be true, then, 75 percent ultimately determine whether or not the plan is to go into effect?

Mr. LOGAN. I think the court first determines it, but that determination is not effective unless 75 percent approve it. If 75 percent fail to approve the plan, then the court cannot put it into effect, but if 75 percent do approve it, then the court has already put it into effect, depending upon the contingency whether the 75 percent will or will not approve it.

Mr. BORAH. But the determination as to whether or not the plan shall be executed depends at last upon whether 75 percent approve.

Mr. LOGAN. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. So that everything, in the last analysis, depends upon the approval of 75 percent?

Mr. LOGAN. That is correct.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the fact that that means that after all creditors have been given due notice, and after the 5 percent have had their opportunity, and, in fact, all creditors have had their opportunity to resist or object to the finding before the final decree goes into effect. They have all had notice.

Mr. BORAH. What I am interested in is to ascertain whether the power of the court, the discretion of the court, remains to be exercised in the judgment of the court notwithstanding the action of the 75 percent.

Mr. McCARRAN. It would be my construction that the jurisdiction of the court to change the plan ceases after it has passed through all the stages, including the 75-percent stage, as I term it. There is where the jurisdiction of the court ceases and the plan becomes effective. Intermediate to that, remember that 5 percent at any time can come in and upset the whole affair. That may be the 5 percent of the outstanding 25 percent who do not sign up.

Mr. BORAH. But that 5 percent may not object after 51 percent have decided upon the plan. Of course, the court would have power, I presume, in the first instance, to reject the plan after 51 percent had approved; but after that, the 5 percent would not have any opportunity to be heard.

Mr. McCARRAN. I beg the Senator's pardon, but I did not understand him.

Mr. BORAH. After the court had approved the plan which 51 percent had endorsed then the 5 percent would have no power after that to interpose any objection.

Mr. McCARRAN. They would have at any time within a stated period, which is 90 days, as I recall.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. WALCOTT. Of course, a bill of this kind admits the existence of a great emergency, and, of course, it gives a serious black eye to a series of bonds that have been our chief source of investment, and which have been supposed to be one of our soundest investments, namely, municipal bonds. On the other hand, I am not at all sure that it may not be essential to enact some such bill as an emergency measure.

Therefore I should like to ask this question: Can the Senator not present an exhibit that will show marginal cases, those that will just come under the amendment and those that will just fail to come under it, so that we may better understand with what we are dealing? Because there are some large cities today that are in very serious financial straits, which probably must have relief and which cannot get relief, perhaps, unless some plan of this sort shall be provided by the law to enable them to reorganize.

The railroads, in my opinion, which have large amounts of surplus funds invested in municipals, are in favor of some measure of this kind; and, so far as I know, the large insurance companies, which are large investors in municipals, are not objecting to it; but I think it would be illuminating if we could get some marginal cases, so that we might know exactly what we are affecting and how much we are affecting and what cities would come under the scope of the proposed law.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Connecticut bases his question, first, upon the proposition that this measure will affect municipal bonds adversely. I think it can be easily demonstrated that it may well become a life-saving measure in respect to municipal bonds as a whole and as a class.

In respect to his request for specific exhibits, while the Senator from Nevada is amply able to respond to the question himself, I simply inject the observation that when I can obtain the floor I will amply cover with specific exhibits the precise problem submitted by the Senator from Connecticut and prove, I think beyond the shadow of a doubt that there is no recourse except through legislation of this character.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, may I correct the Senator from Michigan in one respect?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. WALCOTT. I should like to correct a slight misunderstanding on the part of the Senator from Michigan. I did not say that I thought municipal bonds would be injured by this measure. I said that the measure of itself was an indication that municipal bonds are in a very bad way and need some emergency legislation.

Mr. McCARRAN. I want to say that in presenting this amendment by way of a substitute——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves the subject, I merely wish to say that I have not been able to hear all the discussion that has taken place on the other side, and I am in some doubt now as to just the changes which the substitute proposes. I think I understand what the substitute provides for; but will the Senator tell us in a brief way just the difference between the proposed substitute and the original bill?

Mr. McCARRAN. I was trying to do that, but had only gotten to the third page. I want to dwell on the three primary differences first of all.

The original bill provides that the machinery might be set in motion upon the petition of 30 percent of the outstanding obligations, and that they might come into court and there suggest a plan or one might be suggested. The proposed substitute provides that not less than 51 percent of the outstanding bonds, notes, and certificates of indebtedness must sign the petition and they must submit and file with the petition a plan of readjustment. A plan must be submitted, and it becomes, as I might with propriety, perhaps, state, a jurisdictional feature in connection with the court's taking hold of the matter at all. That is the first primary change.

The second is that 66⅔ percent of each class of outstanding obligations shall accept the plan which the court sets in motion by its order and judgment.

Mr. NORRIS. That is in both the original bill and the amendment, is it not?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct. Now we come down to the distinct change.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, that is not quite correct. In the original bill the requirement was 66⅔ percent of all claims; there was no segregation. In the amendment there is a double check: First, 66⅔ percent of each class of claims, and, second, 75 percent of the aggregate of the claims. Does the Senator from Nebraska see the difference?

Mr. McCARRAN. In other words, if the holders of one class of outstanding obligations refuse to come in with the 66⅔ percent, the plan would not go into effect, distinguishing it from the original bill which provided a 66⅔ percent of all, taking the entire class or classes of outstanding obligations.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the provision in relation to the 75 percent that must ultimately control, applicable to both the bill and the amendment?

Mr. McCARRAN. No, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. What is that difference?

Mr. McCARRAN. I will read that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the provision as to 75 percent was not in the original bill; in that bill it was 66⅔ percent of the aggregate claims; there was no requirement as to each class of claims. Under the original bill, for that matter, if the outstanding claims were in two classes, one class of claims might force the other to abide by the agreement, but that would not be true under the proposed amendment. Does the Senator see the distinction?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to inquire if that is not a very dangerous provision? Would it not make it possible for a class of holders of bonds and certificates of indebtedness or of any other sort of a claim against a taxing district or a municipality to hold up or prevent a settlement? It is necessary to get two thirds of those ordinary claims——

Mr. McCARRAN. Of each class.

Mr. FLETCHER. Might it not confer a dangerous power on people holding claims not of very much consequence, but still claims? If it be necessary to get two thirds of those, they might hold up the entire bond issue.

Mr. McCARRAN. I want to say, as I started to say a few moments ago, that in presenting this proposed substitute, the record will show first of all that I was one of the minority of the Judiciary Committee signing against the approval of the original bill. It is to try to enact some legislation on this subject which will be safeguarded in every respect, and yet accomplish the ends and objects at which the original bill was aimed, that I present the proposed substitute. Had it not been for the safeguards which I think I have written into the proposed substitute, I would be here opposing the original bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The question propounded by the Senator from Florida is one that is extremely important. If it be surrounded with too many precautions, why could not a few people having claims of no great importance hold up the whole machinery?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I want to answer the question of the Senator from Nebraska by the language of the bill, but while I am looking for that I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I was about to observe that it seems to me, in the consideration of a bill of this character, when so many able lawyers challenge its constitutionality, that in any provisions which can be inserted, which perhaps will remove some of the vices from it, there ought not to be any objection to taking into consideration the claims of creditors as well as the interests of debtors. While it may be desirable to begin repudiation, and this is in part the repudiation of obligations issued by municipalities and States and counties and by political subdivisions, it seems to me when we are considering that question we ought also to consider the sanctity of contracts and the interests of creditors.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. McCARRAN. Very well.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the interruption made by the Senator from Utah again puts a most unfortunate and inappropriate misinterpretation upon the entire trend and purpose of the proposed legislation. It is utterly unrelated to repudiation or cancelation. On the contrary, it is offering some means at last by which a brave but stricken community can avoid repudiation and cancelation by having a means of composition on a basis which is honorable and fair. It is the exact antithesis of repudiation and cancelation, and the real purpose behind it is not to destroy municipal bonds, but to preserve and protect them.

Mr. McCARRAN. I concur in the general expression of the learned Senator from Michigan. Were it not for the fact that I do concur in it, I should not be behind the bill at all, either by substitute or amendment or the original bill. I think the country today is in a condition where some relief must and should be afforded to municipalities as well as to individuals and corporations—not a relief for the purpose of repudiation but a relief that will afford them, as the common expression goes, a breathing spell in which and from which they may honor their outstanding obligations.

Were it not for that I should not stand behind the bill at all. I think it simply affords an avenue by which municipalities may find a way to meet their obligations; but I do not propose to be behind a measure which cuts off too high a percentage of the outstanding obligations and refuses them a chance to protect themselves. On the other hand, I do not believe that the tail should wag the dog, or that 10 percent or 15 percent or 20 percent of outstanding obligations should be able to deny a municipality the right to relieve itself. That is the theory on which I have offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and it is the theory upon which I persist.

Unless Senators want further explanation, I shall proceed to read the proposed substitute; or if there is any question to be asked, I shall be glad to answer it.

I want to say, in complete explanation and answer to the learned Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], that it is my objective and my interpretation of the substitute that there must be, first of all, the initial step of 51 percent of outstanding obligations to set the matter in motion. They must have a plan; otherwise they cannot go into court and have recognition. That plan is then submitted to the outstanding obligations for their approval and also for the approval, as well, of the municipality of taxing district. Then 66⅔ percent of each one of the classes of those obligaions must come in and approve it. Suppose there be a bonded indebtedness of one class and a bonded indebtedness of another class; 66⅔ percent of each of those two classes may come in and approve. Then, if the plan is to go finally into operation, 75 percent of the total must come in and approve, and then it becomes a final working organization to relieve the situation.

Mr. President, if the Senate cares to go on with the proposed substitute, I will invite attention to a comparison between it and the bill. The change is in the first paragraph on page 4, which we have already discussed. There is no change in the second paragraph or the third paragraph on page 4. There is no change in the second paragraph on page 5. The other paragraph on that page I have already discussed. In other words, outside of these changes which I have already discussed and to which I have invited the attention of Senators, the proposed substitute is practically the same as the bill, with some correcting amendments which will be necessary to conform to the changes I have inserted in my amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I understand the Senator has a right to modify his proposed substitute and that he has done so.

Mr. McCARRAN. I intend to do so and shall, if I have not already done so.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest that the Senator has the right to modify his substitute in the manner heretofore indicated. I want to offer an amendment to the proposed substitute, believing it ought to be perfected before we go further. I think there will be no objection to my suggestion. On page 5, line 9, after the word "act", I desire to insert the words "and all holders of judgments rendered against such taxing district." I think perhaps holders of judgments are included in the other language anyway, but the amendment would make it plain that all judgments against taxing districts should be included among the claims.

Mr. McCARRAN. The object of the Senator's amendment is that judgments shall not be a preferred claim in any way, but shall simply take their place as one class of claims.

Mr. FLETCHER. Exactly.

Mr. McCARRAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then I offer the amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am willing to accept the amendment in modification of my substitute. I now move the adoption of the amendment in the nature of a substitute, which I have sent to the desk. Then, my motion being in order, other amendments would have to wait until my amendment has been adopted or rejected.

Mr. FLETCHER. The idea is first to perfect the substitute.

Mr. McCARRAN. I have accepted the Senator's suggested amendment to the substitute, and I think that settles it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; that settles it. The Senator has modified his substitute by adopting my suggestion?

Mr. McCARRAN. Yes.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, has the proposed substitute of the Senator from Nevada been adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the amendment in the nature of a substitute has not as yet been adopted. Its adoption is the pending question.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I do not undertake to discuss the legal phases of the measure at all, because I am not a lawyer, but I am very anxious to submit to the Senate the impressively important practical phases of the problem which is addressed by the legislation. It is exceedingly unfortunate that this bill had to come into the Senate related in any degree whatsoever to the bankruptcy law. If it had not come as an amendment to the bankruptcy act, it would have saved itself much of the superficial prejudice which it otherwise unfortunately and unjustly combats. As a matter of fact there is not a single thing in the proposal which smacks even remotely of bankruptcy, or of any intention or purpose on the part of any municipality to take advantage of bankruptcy action as that term ordinarily is understood.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, that is exactly the objection to it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What is the objection?

Mr. HASTINGS. The objection is that we are declaring something is bankrupt which is not actually bankrupt.

Mr. VANDENBERG. On the contrary, we are doing absolutely nothing of the sort, either textually or in letter or in spirit.

Mr. HASTINGS. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the only way in which this subject could be brought into court is under the provision of the Constitution which permits the courts to deal with bankruptcies.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Would the Senator be in favor of this program if it met his constitutional view, may I inquire?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not know whether I would or not. I am not prepared to say. My objection to it is that we are compelled to deal with municipalities, apparently—I do not know any other way—as we do with business concerns that cannot pay their debts.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator is not emphasizing an objection to the bill. On the contrary, he is emphasizing the precise thing I originally stated, namely, the fact that the legislation has to come before us in connection with the bankruptcy law invites inevitably a conclusion which does not reflect the purpose of the legislation in fact. That, however, is no reason why we should decline to contemplate the realities and face the facts with open minds and open eyes and open ears, because this seems to be the only fair way in which our hard-pressed municipal taxing units can approach this problem.

So we are here in connection with the bankruptcy act, but we are here in connection with a program which has not one thought or word or suspicion of repudiation of debt in it; which has not one thought or word or purpose of cancelation in it; but which, on the contrary, is undertaking by legal formula to find a way by which hard-pressed cities can avoid repudiation, and avoid cancelation, and reclaim an honorable credit, and sustain it in practical fact and pay as they go.

If this bill could be labeled in reflection of its true purpose, and labeled in reflection of the net result which it is calculated to accomplish, instead of being labeled "Bankruptcy of municipalities" as is the phrase which appears upon the front page of the hearings, it would be labeled "An act to restore municipal credit and protect municipal creditors." I can see it in no other light. It is not a step toward the destruction of these important values. It is a long, vigorous, practical step toward the restoration of these values. It proposes, in respect to municipal debts, that orderly refunding is preferable to chaotic defaults.

There is our choice, Mr. President; and that is not only the choice confronted by the municipalities and these other subordinate taxing units of the country but also the choice confronted by the municipal bond owners of the country. It is a choice between orderly refunding upon the one hand and chaotic default upon the other; and I might add that chaotic default inevitably leads in the direction of repudiation and cancelation. I repeat that a truthful title for this bill would be "An act to restore municipal credit and protect municipal creditors." Let it be viewed in that light.

This is an effort to choose orderly refunding under the law, and under every possible protection with which the law can surround the operation. It is an effort to permit orderly refunding instead of to permit the situation to drift along toward continuing defaults which lead in a direction which sooner or later leads to repudiation.

If chaotic defaults, involving the suspension of all current income to the bondholder and flinging him to the cold mercy of some relatively impotent and usually expensive protective committee, are preferable to orderly refunding under acceptable plans for the conservation of acknowledged obligations, then this bill should be defeated, but not otherwise. If orderly refunding involving fiscal convalescence for stricken cities and their willing but helpless taxpayers is preferable to chaotic defaults which paralyze alike the municipality and its helpless creditors, then this bill should pass.

I repeat, Mr. President, we take our choice between preferring a legal formula for orderly refunding, or we leave the open rule of today, which is a rule of chaotic default, trending in the direction of repudiation and cancelation. If anybody can show me where the owner of a municipal security has any stake or advantage in the latter alternative—namely, default, cancelation, repudiation—then, and then only, shall I be able to understand why the owners of municipal securities should have anything except the utmost hospitality for this legislation. Many of the most experienced municipal security holders take this latter view, I am happy to report, and shall be glad to prove.

Mr. President, as the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] has indicated, there were 2,019 taxing districts in default in the United States in January 1934. It has been said that this is primarily a Michigan problem, and that the necessity for this legislation primarily grows out of a difficult situation in Detroit. Beyond any shadow of a doubt, Michigan municipalities have a tremendous stake in the success of this legislation, and so has the great city of Detroit, which is bravely fighting its way out of the very bottom of the slough of despond. It is, however, a total misconception to pretend that this is any localized legislation, either in its inception or in its benefits.

The truth is that Michigan is eighth on the list of States in actual number of defaults. It is preceded by Florida, North Carolina, Ohio, Texas, California, New Jersey, and Tennessee. In other words, this problem is even more important in those States than it is in the State of Michigan.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator's figures relate to the number of defaults, as I understand.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH. What are the relative amounts involved?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have not the total in dollars, but I apprehend——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The total is something in excess of 10 percent of the outstanding obligations of the municipalities.

Mr. WALSH. Of all subdivisions issuing securities?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Oh, yes; that is the total situation. I did not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. WALSH. Which of the States named has the largest sum in default?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not know, but I should not be surprised if the State of Michigan has the largest sum in default, unless it be the State of Florida. The fact remains that the problem of carrying the burden of a defaulted bond issue is relatively just as great in a small taxing unit as it is in a large taxing unit. So the mere bulk total of the figures is far less important than the actual number of taxing units in default, because in each one of these taxing units the problem is a very deadly and practical one; namely, "How can we get out of our tax resources, in the face of our tax delinquencies, enough tax revenue to pay our police service and our fire service and our health service and our educational service and our welfare service, and at the same time pay our debt service?"

Mr. President, in many of these situations—in fact, in all of them—in order to preserve the communal unit from disintegration it has been absolutely necessary to subordinate the debt service to these other welfare services; and the debt service ought to be subordinated to these public welfare services—the health service, the educational service, the fire and police services—if anything has to be subordinated, because, even from the standpoint of the tangible value behind the holding of the municipal-bond holder himself, nothing could affect his tangible value any more than to have a complete disintegration of the social and communal life in the community.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. On the contrary, in order that municipalities could go into the market and borrow money with which to meet their so-called social obligations, it has been necessary to meet this financial obligation. Is not that true?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH. So that in some instances the social prerogatives and rights of the people have had to suffer because of the necessity, above everything else, of meeting the debt obligation in order to go into the market and borrow.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yet slowly but surely these units finally reach a point where, except as they can legally set their debt service in order, they confront an absolutely blank wall in respect to all other credits. Therefore a practical, honorable composition of the debt problem finally becomes prerequisite to the maintenance of municipal credit and municipal life at all in these 2,000 and more situations.

Therefore, Mr. President, this is far more than a problem in bonds. In its final and fundamental analysis it is a problem in the maintenance of community life in some 2,000 of these taxing units up and down the country.

This bill only asks that these groups and units of our fellow citizens shall have an orderly opportunity to survive the concluding phases of this depression, to husband their tax resources against the better day when they may pay their debts in full, to preserve their honor, their credit, and their self-respect, and to protect the rights of those to whom they are indebted, and to whom they intend to pay their debts on the basis of maximum capacity to pay. To deny such an opportunity is fiscal insanity upon the one hand, and the refinement of man's inhumanity to man upon the other hand.

It is beyond my comprehension how such a program can threaten any honest interest or any rational investor or creditor. Indeed, it is not always advisable or safe, nor is it often wise, or actually resultful, for the creditor to demand the letter of his bond, and take his pound of flesh. Shylock tried that method. That is not always the wisest course. It seems to me that, in respect to the situation in which these municipal-bond holders find themselves, it most certainly is not the wisest course to undertake to pursue the letter of the bond to its final pound of flesh.

Why not? The situation is disclosed over all this country. Here is a municipality which finds its budget, upon the one hand, no matter how curtailed it may have been, unequal to the burden of meeting its essential administrative costs, and also its entire debt service, which has to be suspended. The suspension of the debt service puts the credit of the municipality under a cloud. Under the cloud, the municipality has difficulty even in financing its own other essential needs. Swiftly the whole thing moves to a climax in which the probable result to the bondholder will be that he possesses a security upon which he not only procures no current interest payments, but upon which he finally sacrifices his principal. From the viewpoint of the bondholder himself this is not enlightened selfishness.

What is the proposal brought here to the bar of the Senate? I refer alike to the McCarran amendment and to the committee's recommendation. Here is a proposition under which a municipality, bravely willing to pay out every penny that it can by way of tax resource in meeting all of its obligations, has an opportunity to sit down with its creditors, has an opportunity to lay out a plan satisfactory to 75 percent of them, has an opportunity to make that plan effective, with the consent of the court, has the opportunity to create a plan which, like practically every plan that I know anything about which has been voluntarily proposed in the last few months, protects every dollar of the principal of these obligations; has an opportunity, under this system, to rewrite the contract, not in repudiation, not in cancelation, but on a basis of capacity to pay, so that the bondholder is restored to a current interest revenue, even though it be reduced, and is safeguarded in the final total collection of its principal. In each such instance, furthermore, the municipality usually is committed by the composition to rigid administrative economy. It is a warrant for wiser and better and more economical municipal control.

The pending composition in Detroit, for example, is a positive program in behalf of good government. Detroit has faced a serious problem. Its bonded debt rose from $7,600,000 in 1910 to $350,000,000 in 1933. Its fixed charges rose in a few brief years from $14,000,000 in 1928 to $34,000,000 in 1934. Its total expenditures rose from $103,000,000 in 1925 to $160,000,000 in 1931. By heroic economy, entailing much suffering, this was cut to $93,000,000 in 1934. For example, 10,000 city employees were discharged and the city government was reduced to a survival basis and the employees to a welfare-existence wage. Property valuations fell from $3,774,000,000 in 1931 to $2,300,000,000 in 1933. Tax delinquencies increased from $2,000,000 in 1929 to $69,000,000 in 1933. In the face of that situation, it is a splendid tribute to the spirit of Detroit that a bond-refunding program—preserving the full principal—has been developed satisfactory to 92 percent of the creditors. Detroit bonds were selling at 38 when the refunding agreement was negotiated and signed. Within 1 month they rose to 55 on the strength only of the rotative agreement. They will move on up in the presence of a completed program, which includes a covenant that when city operating costs, outside fixed charges, exceed $40,000,000 a year, the city will levy an additional dollar for debt service to match every dollar of added administrative expense.

I submit that the bondholder is infinitely better off under those auspices than he was under the former chaotic situation. In most of these situations he otherwise finds himself completely at the mercy of some volunteer protective bondholders' committee and the incident of default, which may cost him more even than the original debacle before he is through, despite the good faith with which the committee may proceed.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. DIETERICH. The bill, or the McCarran amendment, would bind the municipal corporation or subdivision which might avail itself of the provisions of the legislation, counties, cities, boroughs, villages, and so forth, being specified. I want to ask the Senator from Michigan whether, under the constitution of his State, there is a limitation on the amount to which a city, county, or a municipality may become indebted?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am unable to answer the Senator's question specifically. There is a limitation.

Mr. DIETERICH. In most States it is limited to 5 percent of the assessed valuation of the property, and I think that is general in all the States. I am just wondering how a county or city could come in under the provisions of this legislation, which is based upon the proposition that it is insolvent, and ask for a reduction of its indebtedness, unless the entire assessed valuation of the property within the county, within the city, or the municipality is less than the bonded indebtedness, which, in Illinois, is limited to 5 percent.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is submitting a legal proposition, and at the outset I indicated my desire to confine myself to the practical phase of the problem, first, because it is the only one with which I am completely familiar, and, second, I am not a lawyer, and would not undertake to cope with that side of the contemplation. I am perfectly sure, however, that none of the obstacles to which the Senator refers exists in fact, because all these various Michigan municipalities, for example, which look to this bill for relief, have canvassed it in the purview of expert legal advice, and I am perfectly confident that they would not be here begging for relief in this precise form if they had not been legally satisfied with regard to the proposal.

Mr. DIETERICH. I do not want the Senate to understand me as being opposed to the measure.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand.

Mr. DIETERICH. I am just wondering whether or not it will afford the relief which is desired. Let me continue further, with the Senator's permission. I conceive an improvement district, where the adjoining property has been assessed for an improvement. It might be such an improvement as to the adjoining property would not carry, and the improvement district should have relief, and they would get relief under the bill. But I really fail to see where a county, a city, or any other municipality in a State whose constitution limits the amount to which it may become indebted will receive any relief under the legislation.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. VANDERBERG. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. There are States in the Union in which there is no constitutional limitation such as the Senator from Illinois suggests.

Mr. DIETERICH. That answers my question. I wondered whether there were States where there was no constitutional limitation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, let me personify this thing with a typical case, which brings the challenge right down to date. I refer to the city of Pontiac, Mich.

The city of Pontiac, Mich., is a busy, thriving, prosperous community in normal times. It was bludgeoned by the depression more than normally because of its substantial dependence upon the automotive business.

As a result of tremendous tax delinquencies, it found it absolutely impossible to maintain its debt service from year to year, along with its essential local services, such as police, fire, health, education, and so forth. It had no alternative, in that situation, except to maintain its police, fire, health, education, and welfare services first, although on greatly reduced bases, and I doubt whether any Senator would ask them to operate those particular services in subordination to debt service, if some choice or selection had to be made.

The net result was that the securities of the city of Pontiac went into default, and they stayed in default for some time, while the local community was bravely struggling with the problem of refunding its debt upon some livable basis which would permit it again to meet all of its services, including its debt service, and to avoid repudiation.

A very able and high-minded committee was formed for the purpose of concluding an arrangement of this nature. A plan was perfected contemplating the preservation of principal intact. Mark this, every dollar of the principal was acknowledged, under the plan of refunding, with a concession of interest for a period of 5 years, and a very small adjustment of interest for the period of time following.

I quote now an observation from the able secretary of the committee which created this plan:

> This plan is thoroughly practical in that it will permit the city to remain on a cash basis for operations, will permit of a rehabilitation of utilities, maintenance of which has been neglected, and give relief to the taxpayers.

Here is the city of Pontiac developing its plan. What happened when they developed the plan? I quote now from the secretary of the committee which created the plan:

> I am in touch with and can locate about 75 percent of all the outstanding bonds and am probably better informed in regard to this feature than any other agency. There is a missing 25 percent that I have been unable to contact in 18 months. My general idea is that there is a widely scattered holding in small amounts, and even the placing of information before them and the obtaining of their support promises to be difficult.

Mr. President, contemplate the situation. Here is this municipality, not seeking a route to repudiation, but seeking a route to the renewal of the integrity of its own municipal securities, seeking a means by which they can be restored to a basis of current interest payment, seeking a means by which the total principal shall be paid at the expiration of the bond.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. What is the particular difficulty at present that distresses Pontiac, Mich.?

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the Senator will contain himself for a moment he will be advised.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am sorry. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the committee procures the consent of this 75 percent of interested bondholders to this program, so everyone in this group is satisfied; that is, everyone who could be contacted. There remains the 25 percent which has not been contacted. It now develops that in that 25 percent is a very small group which goes into the Supreme Court of Michigan for a mandamus to compel the taxing authority of Pontiac to add to its 1934 budget the necessary funds to cover the defaulted bonds, and that problem is now pending in the Michigan Supreme Court.

Let it be marked that this not only involves the question of these particular securities; it involves the whole question of the Pontiac municipal budget for the year to come; it involves the entire Pontiac municipal regime. This group of objecting bondholders represents but a very small percentage—I thought I had the figure, but apparently I have not—a very small percentage of the bondholders related to this problem. This comparatively insignificant minority—not resident in Pontiac, not resident in Michigan, not involved in the responsibilities of maintaining municipal life intact—this comparatively small minority is able to say, at least temporarily, not only that 75 percent of the bondholders in this difficult situation shall not be permitted to have their voluntarily chosen recourse but that the community itself shall be further strangled and denied the opportunity to restore itself as a going concern.

I submit, Mr. President, as a matter of equity in such a situation that the pending bill should be adopted.

May I digress long enough to say that this telegram from Pontiac states that—

> The Sumners bill relief was considered yesterday at a public meeting and is believed to be an utter public necessity.

Let us see as to who would be injured in the event the solution of the Pontiac problem should be able to proceed under the Sumners bill. Since 75 percent of creditors would have approved the plan and since the plan does not involve the cancelation of one penny of the principal, since it only involves a composition in respect to contemporary interest, it is fair to assume that the plan would be approved by the court to which it would be submitted under the Sumners bill. Therefore, Mr. President, let us assume that this plan would have been approved had the Sumners bill been in effect, or will be approved in the near future if the Sumners bill goes into effect. What happens? Because more than three quarters of all the creditors agree, and because the court agrees and because the taxing unit agrees, it is possible for this plan to go into operation, and no casual minority on the outside can prevent it. Who is harmed, I repeat, as the result of that operation? Certainly the municipality of Pontiac is not harmed, because at last it is able again to renew its normal operations and pay as it goes. Certainly the health service and the police and fire and educational and welfare service in Pontiac—and I use it only as a typical municipality—are not injured by the restoration of a fundamental credit upon which the municipality can lean for its continuity.

Certainly the bondholders themselves are infinitely better off, Mr. President. Today they are getting nothing. Today they are in the hands of a bondholders' protective committee which is negotiating in behalf of some sort of composition. Today the bondholder is receiving not one cent of interest. He will not receive a cent of interest tomorrow or the day after unless some such composition as this is created, because blood cannot be gotten out of a turnip, and the American people can never be made to believe that debt service ought to take priority over police and health and educational and fire service if a selection between the two has to be made.

You can argue your legal technicalities as finely as you please, but as a practical proposition the bondholder is infinitely better off when he has this refunded plan behind his securities, and knows with reasonable assurance that from now on that he will get a substantial portion of his interest, and that at the end of the journey he will get his principal in full.

Mr. President, I think that is a thoroughly typical demonstration of the need for legislation of this character.

Oh, but somebody says, "This will reflect upon the values of municipal securities."

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have contained myself until I thought the Senator was about to leave Pontiac, and if he is, and before he leaves, I should like to inquire whether there are any taxes due in Pontiac, and how much they are, and how they compare with the interest due on its bonds. My purpose being to find out whether this is for the relief of the taxpayer, taking it from the bondholder, or just what the situation is in Pontiac.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I have the information somewhere on my desk, and I shall be very glad to accommodate the Senator with the details at the conclusion of my observations when I can locate the details. I say to the Senator as a general proposition, and I speak from knowledge, that the failure in Michigan cities, like Pontiac, to produce an adequate revenue to maintain the full debt service is in no degree due to any unwillingness on the part of the taxpayer to pay and pay and pay to the limit of his capacity. On the contrary the trouble is due to the enormous tax delinquencies which, fortunately, are now receding. It is due to tax delinquencies which are nonproductive in all aspects. In the face of those delinquencies the cities of Michigan—and I include the city of Detroit, now so ably directed by Mayor Frank Couzens, the son of my senior colleague—have heroically contracted their budgets, they have heroically economized. No sane man could ask them to make greater progress than they have made in this respect. Still they cannot maintain health, safety, and welfare and pay the letter of the bond. If they must comply with the letter of the bond they must default.

Do Senators think, in the face of that situation, that it is better that they should default? Do Senators tell me in that situation that it is better that they should cease to maintain public safety, public health, and public education in order to pay the debt service, or do Senators tell me that it is advisable, as is the case in Detroit this afternoon, to create a refunding plan which 92 percent of the bondholders and the creditors cordially and enthusiastically approve?

Who shall have a better right to censor this plan in respect to this Detroit situation—92 percent of the owners of the securities representing its vast municipal debt, or the Senator from Delaware, or some other Senator upon this floor?

I submit that the physical fact I am presenting demonstrates the importance of permitting this Detroit program and all kindred programs to carry on, and I submit that if some little lonesome minority can enter the Detroit equation and upset the considered, concluded judgment of 92 percent of its creditors, plus the considered judgment of the court to which the matter would be submitted under the Sumners bill, it would be a social and economic calamity. I decline to lend myself to any such tragedy which lacks any compensatory advantages for anybody.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I should like to inquire whether or not any effort has been made by the municipalities of the State of Michigan to secure from the legislature which created those municipalities a moratorium under circumstances such as these?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am unable to answer the Senator. I should infinitely prefer Federal legislation of this character to legislation contemplating a moratorium in the various States. I fail to get the point of the Senator's inquiry.

Mr. HASTINGS. Would it not be reasonable to request relief in a regular way from the States which created these municipalities? I assume it might be regular to do so, under the powers which permit them to legislate with respect to bankruptcy, at least in view of the recent decision of the Supreme Court, rather than to come to the Federal authorities for relief.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the Senator submits an interesting question, and I know he submits it in good faith. I think one of the major reasons why this proposed legislation is sound is that it is calculated to prevent State legislation upon this subject, and thus to preclude 48 separate and distinct rules of action up and down this country in regard to the defaulted municipal securities. If the Senator's suggestion were pursued, a great insurance company, which is a typical mass owner of municipal securities to a tremendous degree, instead of having one acceptable Federal formula under which to proceed in a uniform composition of the situation up and down the country, would find itself confronting 48 different separate rules of action, and that, indeed, would be chaos. So I respectfully reply to the Senator that the very criticism which he levels at the Sumners bill in this respect is, in my judgment, one of the profound reasons why it ought to pass.

Now, Mr. President, is this law asked only by cities whose credit is in difficulty? Oh, no; this plea is not based exclusively upon subordinate taxing units of this country that are in difficulties. On the contrary, one of the most powerful requests for the passage of the Sumners bill comes from the United States conference of mayors. It comes from an executive committee of that association. I quote from a letter dated March 6, 1934, signed by Paul V. Betters, its executive director:

It will be noted that the cities represented on the committee—

That is, on the executive committee—

are not in default and do not need this legislation, but they have taken this action on behalf of defaulted municipalities because of the definite belief that unless the default situation is cleared up the credit of all financially solvent cities will be impaired and injured beyond repair.

That is the judgment of the gentlemen who are speaking for municipalities whose securities are unimpaired as yet. They express the desire for the enactment of the Sumners bill for the purpose of shoring up the situation, which otherwise might ultimately involve a common downfall.

Now, let us see what cities are these, Mr. President, which join in this request. Here is the mayor of Boston; here is the mayor of New Orleans; the mayor of Milwaukee; the mayor of Newark; the city manager of Cincinnati; the mayor of New York City, our recently highly honored colleague ex-Representative LaGuardia; the mayor of San Francisco; the mayor of Houston, Tex.; the mayor of Richmond, Va.; the mayor of Portland, Oreg.; the mayor of Tampa, Fla.; the mayor of Detroit, Mich.; the mayor of Cleveland, Ohio; the mayor of Providence, R.I.; the mayor of Shreveport, La.; the mayor of Grand Rapids, Mich.; the mayor of Chicago, Ill.; the mayor of Worcester, Mass.; the mayor of St. Paul, Minn.; the mayor of Salt Lake City, Utah; the mayor of New Rochelle, N.Y.; the mayor of Memphis, Tenn.

Mr. HASTINGS rose.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I should like to know how many of these cities are included in the 2,019 which have already repudiated—the Senator does not like to use the word "repudiated"—have failed to pay the interest due on their bonds?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think a majority. I give the Senator the specific language from the executive director:

That the cities represented on the committee—

The executive committee of this conference—are not in default.

Not one upon the committee, the executive committee out of this group which writes this letter.

I cannot separate out these particular names from the list which I have read, which includes the advisory board of the officers who are asking for this proposed legislation. Why are they asking for it? In their own language, they are asking for it because they believe—

That unless the default situation is cleared up, the credit of all financially solvent cities will be impaired and injured beyond repair.

I am inclined to believe that is a correct statement of the prospectus; I am inclined to believe that these gentlemen who hold prime responsibility for the life of these great American municipalities upon the roll which I have called are entitled to be listened to with a great deal of prayerful consideration when they come here with their fiscal problems, because, in the final analysis, so far as the governmental problem of this country today is concerned, in a fiscal sense, the municipality is the weakest link of the chain. Here is the considered voice of the mayoralty of America, if I may use that phrase, asking for this particular bill, which is not a relief bill, in the ordinarily accepted sense of that word, but simply a bill which will permit 75 percent of the creditors of a municipality to agree, with conclusive dependability, with the municipality in respect to a refunding plan which shall save the integrity of municipal credit and which shall restore normal municipal budget functioning within the confines of the municipality itself.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HASTINGS. May I inquire whether any of the counties of the United States involved in the failure to pay their bonds are included in the 2,019, or does that number refer only to municipalities?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think that number refers to all subordinate taxing units which are in default, and I am inclined to believe it includes irrigation districts and road bond districts.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator has not any detailed statement as to exactly what the number 2,019 applies?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have not.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. NEELY. The Senator from Michigan doubtless does know that there are hundreds of counties in the United States that have not been able to pay their school teachers during the last 2 years.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is entirely correct, and I have already referred to it.

Mr. HASTINGS. And which will take advantage of this act if they have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I disagree 1,000 percent with the observation of the Senator from Delaware. There is no purpose to use this proposed act in any situation with which I am familiar to avoid or escape any obligation of any honorable nature. Apply this test in the State of Michigan, whence I come and where I think I know something about what is going on.

Show me any governmental units in this country that have made a braver effort to raise all the municipal taxes they possibly can raise than the taxing units in that Commonwealth during the past year or two; show me a finer loyalty than the loyalty of the police service, the fire service, the educational service, the welfare service, in the face of this challenge and this debacle, working partly on scrip rather than to see the service disintegrate. Do you tell me, Mr. President, that a municipality, the public servants of which are willing to accept scrip in order to maintain the integrity of the units, is a community that is going to sneak under the tent and take some treacherous advantage of legislation of this character? How can they take any advantage of it unless 75 percent of the creditors are willing, unless the court is willing, and unless the taxing unit itself is willing?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does not the Senator believe that, if this bill shall be passed, the 2,019 will rapidly increase or will certainly increase to some extent, notwithstanding his statement that he thought I was a thousand percent wrong?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I would not expect the list to increase at all as a mere result of the passage of this proposed legislation. I not only suspect but know that there are many taxing units just teetering this afternoon on the line as to whether they shall be able to continue to maintain their full debt service or not. If the legislation shall not be passed, those that are in this precarious classification will be found day after tomorrow among the defaulters and the cancelationists and the repudiationists, while, if this bill shall be passed, they will be found in the classification of those honest taxing units which are willing to pay to the last possible cent of capacity in order to maintain a livable contract.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield further to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. Reminding the Senator that from the 24th day of last November to January 30 of this year the number of defaulting taxing districts increased from 1,650 to 2,019, does he not think that the enactment of this legislation would greatly improve the situation?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Precisely. I thank the Senator for his observation.

Mr. President, I had a letter the other day from an expert who has been dealing in municipal bonds for the last quarter of a century. I am now discussing the effect of this proposed legislation upon municipal credit, since that seems to be the favorite excuse of those who are trying to conjure a reason to defeat this bill.

This expert points out that the existing situation—I am talking about the situation which the opponents of the bill are so eager to have continuingly maintained—is a perpetual invitation to sharpers and chiselers to deal in defaulted issues on the basis of what he calls "gyp" prices. In other words, the situation as it exists today is that the uncertainty with respect to this great mass of municipal securities, with all the uncertainties in values as a result, is a direct and specific invitation to a class of chiseling which we know is going on, the chiseling of the "gyp" dealer who takes advantage of a lack of a firm market to trade municipal bondholders out of their securities and into something else which same day they will rue the day they obtained. I quote from this expert:

Unless something is done in these times whereby the municipality and the bondholder get together to form some kind of a regulation and refunding program at once—

That describes the terms of the bill—

I fear that any bonds that are offered by any city or town will have a hard time to sell unless they make the interest rate so attractive that it may be prohibitive.

His whole theory and philosophy is that we have immeasurably improved the municipal bond market and municipal bond values when we take this great factor of two thousand and more uncertainties out of the municipal bond situation. It seems to me he is unanswerably right.

Mr. President, the President of the United States indicated in a press conference that he favored the passage of the Sumners bill and would ask his administration followers to put it upon the law books before the session adjourned, and from that day to this, municipal-bond values have been stronger. I think that is a provable statement.

What happened in the case of the city of Detroit? The bonds were selling at between 30 and 40 up to the moment when this refunding plan was broached and showed some signs of success. Immediately the bonds moved up in the market. If the Sumners bill should put the mark of finality upon the refunding bond program of that great municipality, there is no doubt whatever in my mind that the bonds of the city of Detroit would one day rapidly reapproach par.

Where will they be without a refunding program? Where will they be under their refunding program, though it is approved by 92 percent of the creditors, if some lonesome minority trouble maker tries to upset the whole program perhaps for the purpose of commanding a little nuisance-value reward in order to be bought off? Where will the city be? Where will the bondholders be? They will be holding the bag, Mr. President, and the bag will be substantially empty.

Is that just my opinion? Is that opinion totally lacking in responsible credentials? I submit that it is not. In the first place I want to remind the Senate of the Canadian system. My authority is David M. Wood, of Thompson, Wood & Hoffman, New York municipal-bond experts at the bar:

Under the Canadian law when a municipality or taxing district defaults the creditors are not permitted complete liberty of action against the defaulting unit. Under the Canadian system a public commission investigates the situation, determines the capacity of the municipality to pay its debts—determines the capacity of the municipality to pay its debts, and an adjustment on the basis of that determination is offered to its creditors. The creditors have no voice in the proceeding under the Canadian system.

I repeat that phrase because it is the philosophy of the Sumners bill—

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the Canadian law, however, that is the permanent law.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. When a man buys a bond he buys it knowing that may be done at any time?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is entirely correct. From this point on in our experience during the 2 years' life of this emergency law when our municipalities must again find buyers for their bonds, the buyers will know in advance of the existence of the Sumners law, and my prophecy would be that they will buy with far greater assurance if they know that in the event of trouble there is a legal formula for orderly refunding rather than if they realize that in the event of trouble there must be chaotic default and a reliance upon some self-starting bondholders' protective committee before they can even start to commence to begin to protect their equity. That way lies repudiation.

I continue with reference to the Canadian system:

The creditors have no voice in the proceedings.

Under the pending measure the creditors have a 75 percent voice in the proceeding. This procedure is far more drastic, so far as the rights of the creditors are concerned, than anything contemplated by the Sumners bill, because under the provisions of that bill no readjustment of the indebtedness of a taxing district can be consummated without approval of the holders of two thirds, and under the McCarran amendment three fourths, in amount of the indebtedness of the taxing district.

If the arguments of the opponents of the bill are sound, Canadian municipal securities should command less advantageous prices than our own in the market today. Do they? They do not. Usually they command a more favorable price, notoriously so. If the credit of a Canadian municipality compares so favorably with the credit of an American municipality, having per capita debts at all comparable, notwithstanding the fact that in the event of Canadian municipalities getting into financial difficulties their debts may be readjusted without the consent of the creditors by a governmental agency, then it seems very difficult to believe that a statute providing for a readjustment of the debts of municipalities in default under terms approved by the creditors would have such a disastrous effect upon the municipal credit in this country as has been indicated by the opponents of the bill.

Mr. President, I want to quote just one great insurance authority upon the bill. There was a time when the original legislation, which preceded the present Sumners bill, was very violently assaulted by the almost universal insurance-company interests of the United States, representing manifestly, as they do, a great bulk of ownership of the municipal securities of the land. That situation has changed.

I want to read from the testimony, before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, of Mr. C. M. Shanks, representing the Prudential Life Insurance Co., a company which most of us identify as being related in some way to the Rock of Gibraltar. This is the spokesman for the Prudential Insurance Co. advising the Senate Judiciary Committee in respect to the wisdom and advisability of passing the Sumners bill. This is the spokesman for one of the most outstanding and largest insurance companies in the United States, and therefore one of the largest investors in municipal bonds. Let us see what judgment comes from this source. I quote from Mr. Shanks:

You may have also gotten the impression that the bill was favored only by those who represented the debtors and not the creditors. There are many insurance companies, including our company, which are in favor of this bill, and there are also some that are opposed to it. I will confine my remarks to our own situation.

We have about $150,000,000 of municipal and State bonds held in our portfolios. One hundred and seven millions are strictly municipal issues and about forty-two million are State issues. None of those State bonds are in default, but of the municipal bonds about $7,000,000 are in default. They are issued by a large number of taxing districts, something over 300. Thirty-one of those districts are in default, approximately 10 percent of the entire number of taxing districts. We are faced with the situation of 31 taxing districts in default, and what can we do about it? So far as I know, there is nothing we can do by which we can work ourselves out, except a few from Cook County, which probably can work themselves out.

In our particular portfolio we have bonds in a number of cities which are not in position to pay all their indebtedness. They are held as cash reserve, like all State and Government bonds. We have two million of Detroit bonds. We see no way by which we can be relieved from that situation unless a bill incorporating the principles of this bill is passed. We have a similar situation in Anderson County, N.J., and another in Pontiac, Mich. We don't know of any way by which we can clean them up without something like the bill under consideration.

From the point of view of the investor, we think it is much more demoralizing.

Mr. President, I beg the Senate to listen to these observations from the spokesman of the Prudential Life Insurance Co., speaking for the largest single group of municipal securities in the United States:

From the point of view of the investor, we think it is much more demoralizing to be confronted with this sort of situation—

Namely, the chaotic situation of prospective default, to which he had previously been alluding—than to have the privilege of working out some sort of equitable arrangement by which these obligations may eventually be taken care of. We think it is a most demoralizing thing to have such a situation develop without the ability to do anything about it.

And he goes on to state, referring to the alternative of defaults and cancelations:

That is what we fear is going to happen, and we are very much in favor of the passage of this bill.

He favors the passage of this bill in order to prevent those precise calamities.

Mr. President, just one further reference:

The fraternal insurance interests of the country have expressed great perturbation about this bill. I have a letter from the secretary and treasurer of the National Fraternal Congress of America, from which I desire to quote. It is a letter earnestly inveighing against the Sumners bill. If argues that the cities, if left to themselves, will gradually lift themselves out of their difficulties; and this gentleman refers particularly in this aspect to the fact that the Detroit refunding plan is operating, and indicates that "Detroit is rising out of its difficultes."

Mr. President, evidently the author of the letter likes the Detroit refunding plan. Evidently the Detroit refunding plan is contemplated as a highly useful thing from the viewpoint of the author; yet the only thing that the pending legislation would do is to prevent some lone, meager minority from upsetting the Detroit refunding plan and making it impossible for the happy situations to exist which the author of this letter so thankfully applauds.

He concludes, however:

I hope that with these considerations you can see your way clear to change your attitude, and will be in favor of protecting the interests of these fraternal societies, representing nearly 10,000,000 men and women of the country, who do not wish to see their insurance contracts impaired or their plans of insurance disturbed as they would be if this legislation were adopted.

Mr. President, in order to accommodate the wishes of my able friend who addresses me in this letter on behalf of the National Fraternal Congress of America, and in order, using his language, to protect the interests of these fraternal societies and the municipal investments, I must decline to follow his advice because, in my profound judgment, and with all the emphasis at my command, I believe that the best welfare of those fraternal societies and all of their municipal investments is bound up not in the defeat but in the passage of this legislation, so that hereafter, instead of disorderly defaults running on into cancelation and repudiation, we may have orderly refunding plans written within the capacity to pay, and written within the capacity to continue the letter of the bond. I believe profoundly that I am protecting the portfolios of these fraternal societies by supporting the pending measure.

I desire to support that observation by just one final bit of testimony.

Mr. President, the National Fraternal Congress was represented by several witnesses at the hearing upon this bill before the House Committee on the Judiciary. The chief spokesman was Mrs. Bina West Miller, the able and progressive president of the great Women's Benefit Association of Port Huron, Mich. Mrs. Miller was complaining at that time of the bill which was then pending in the House in respect to municipal moratoriums. I think it was called the McLeod bill. Mrs. Miller declared that her chief objection—she was speaking for the National Fraternal Congress—to the bill was that it proceeded to a complete moratorium of debt service without the consent of creditors. Quoting Mrs. Miller:

That is my point, "without the consent of * * * creditors."

Quoting her again:

It seems to me the Wilcox bill approaches solution of this question insofar as it is meant to readjust or refinance all these cities in default, or threatened with default, by reason of inability to sell bonds and refund obligations.

Mark you:

We are all in hearty sympathy with some form of readjustment of distressed municipalities, but we believe that it should be by some form of agreement between debtor and creditor.

Mr. President, the bill to which that criticism was addressed was defeated because it did not contain within it means for contact and agreement between debtor and creditor. Here is the successor bill, now pending in the Senate, which provides specifically for contact and agreement between debtor and creditor, and which gives 26 percent of the creditors the right of veto if desired, but which provides a working program by which three fourths of the creditors can join effectively with the forward-looking taxpaying citizenship of each of these municipalities, and readjust and restabilize the integrity of the local credit, and start anew upon a program of municipal forward march.

From any practical viewpoint which is willing to assess the realities, I can see no reason in the world why the Sumners bill should not be approved by the Senate.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-five Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, I desire very briefly to state my grounds of opposition to the pending measure, and it will take me but a very few minutes to do so.

I am opposed to the measure because I think it is ill-advised both in principle and in thought. Public hearings have developed that there are between 250,000 and 400,000 political subdivisions which would be affected by the bill. Even the proponents agree that there are only in the neighborhood of 2,000 governmental subdivisions in default. Under such circumstances, I insist that there is no universal demand for the proposed legislation.

I am opposed to it on account of the type of holders of municipal securities who would be affected by the bill, it enacted. Such securities in overwhelming percentage are in the hands of executors, administrators, trustees, guardians, and trust estates, and are held for the benefit of a class of people who need to be protected more than any other class in our social fabric. They include insane persons, minors, and similar types of beneficiaries of different trust estates. We have always been told, in our probate courts, that municipal securities are gilt-edged, and such courts have authorized and directed the investment of money in municipal securities as gilt-edged in quality, second only to State and Federal obligations. I am opposed to the pending measure because of the fact that it would adversely affect the type of holders of municipal securities to which I have referred.

I am opposed to it by reason of the fact that there is no universal demand for the enactment of the bill. We have seen here today where the measure largely originated, first, in the State of Florida, and secondly, in the city of Detroit.

There is some excuse for the municipalities and towns and cities of Florida asking for some relief. We are all familiar with, and perhaps in our safes at home have evidences of, the criminally fraudulent real-estate promotions which took place in the State of Florida. I know of savings banks, and banks of all types and characters, which had to place restrictions on withdrawals of deposits in order to keep money from going into that real-estate bubble, which for several years was promoted and acquiesced in by the authorities of the State of Florida.

I never heard of a gesture from the Governor of the State of Florida, or any other public official down there, warning the people of the Middle West against the pyramiding of real-estate values, which was not only fraudulent but criminal. Some of these cities are today in a position as if they had been wiped off the face of the earth, it is true, but it is my contention that it is a matter for State relief, and not for relief by the passage of a Federal statute which would adversely affect so many solvent municipal corporations.

I say I can see some excuse for the cities of Florida. I can see none for the city of Detroit, the interests of which city have been championed so vigorously here today. One of the great industrial and civic centers of the United States, indebted in great sums of money gathered from the savings of the thrifty, from guardians, administrators, trustees, and sources of wealth of that kind and character, the city of Detroit, enjoying great public permanent improvements, bridges, and streets, and boulevards, and sanitary districts, desires this measure for the purpose of enabling it to repudiate its just and honest obligations. If I were a citizen of the city of Detroit, I would have been ashamed of the plea made upon this floor today, or any plea for the repudiation of one thin dime's worth of Detroit's honest and just obligations.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the measure because it is the opening wedge in repudiation of State and Federal obligations. There are certain elementary and academic principles upon which a government is strong or an individual is strong. I do not believe that any man ever succeeded in life unless he took as one of the academic and fundamental principles of his daily life the determination to meet and pay his honest debts. I do not believe that any government can endure in this country which violates that simple, fundamental, academic principle—the will to meet and pay its honest debts.

If a municipality or other political subdivision of a State may repudiate its obligations, the next step is repudiation by the State, and the final step is repudiation by Federal authority, and when that time shall come, all the centuries of effort toward progress and strength and honesty and integrity will crumble in the United States of America.

Mr. President, I attended the public hearings on this bill for 2 days, and I think I know some of the opposition to the measure. Every bonding house and brokerage company in New York was represented here, with all the high-powered lobbyists at their command, to secure the passage of the legislation, because it would mean the issuance of millions upon millions of dollars of refunding bonds, the commissions on the sale of which would mean a rich harvest for the bond brokers of New York City.

Taxpayers, heavy taxpayers, are behind the agitation for the enactment of the measure. I know of some communities where two or three men bear practically the whole burden and pay the bulk of the taxes in the political subdivision. Of course they are behind the enactment of this measure. They are content to retain the public improvements, the beautiful streets, the schoolhouses, the Government buildings of different types and characters, for their own enjoyment and for the enjoyment of their children and their children's children, but they are willing now, in order to save a pittance of their tax assessments, to place the stamp of their approval upon a measure which means repudiation, pure and simple.

Mr. President, I am opposed to this measure because, in my opinion, after listening for 2 days to the testimony in the public hearings, I believe the enactment of the bill into law, and its presence on the statute books for 2 years, will affect unfavorably and adversely the credit and good faith of every obligation of every solvent political subdivision in this country. Even some of the bond brokers and agents who appeared in the public hearings who are in favor of the bill were honest enough to admit on cross-examination that the presence of the bill on the statute books would probably require a higher rate of interest on all municipal obligations issued, and that it would adversely affect the sale of all municipal obligations of the 450,000 or 500,000 political subdivisions which would be potentially affected by the terms of the measure.

Two or three Senators have approached me, since the bill came up for discussion, with questions as to its constitutionality. I am not interested in the constitutionality of the bill. I am not interested in the amendment of my good friend, the Senator from Nevada. To me this bill is so fundamentally unsound in principle and in policy that I do not care whether or not the Supreme Court holds it to be constitutional. If this high legislative body should declare this bill to be founded on an emergency condition I presume that decision would be accepted as a conclusive fact, the existence of which the Supreme Court would not question. But whether it shall be declared constitutional or unconstitutional, I think this bill, the municipal bankruptcy bill now pending, is the most far-reaching and vicious measure introduced during my limited experience of over a year as a Member of this body.

The Senator from Michigan in a play upon words may say that this measure does not mean repudiation. What else can it mean? If 75 percent of the creditors and the taxing districts get together and agree to scale down the principal of their obligations one thin dime, is that not repudiation pure and simple?

There is a difference between buying the obligation of a private corporation and the obligation of a municipality. In the case of the private corporation we have a prospectus showing the assets and liabilities and a history of the business conducted. A municipal obligation is bought upon the full faith and credit of the entire community, which says, in effect, " We intend, Mr. Guardian, Mr. Trustee, Mr. Insane Person, to pay you back 100 cents on the dollar." That is why municipal securities have been considered gilt-edged until the introduction of this vicious measure here on the floor of the Senate.

The constitutionality of this bill was discussed in an opinion rendered to the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the House. The conclusion of that opinion given by the Department of Justice, not by the Attorney General himself, but by some member of his staff, was that this bill would be constitutional " insofar as it applied to a political subdivision and taxing district engaged in a proprietary interest or function, but not where it was engaged wholly in a public or governmental function."

The distinction is pretty hard to draw. Lawyers will recognize that such a distinction is purely of judicial origin. There is no statute defining when a taxing division is acting in a governmental capacity and when it is acting in a proprietorial capacity; but the Attorney General's Office even gave to the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the other House the opinion that insofar as this bill applied to a taxing district engaged purely in a governmental function it was unconstitutional. Yet under the proposed amendment and in the original bill the measure is supposed to apply to all counties, townships, boroughs, and every other conceivable unincorporated taxing district.

For what my opinion may be worth, I may say that I doubt the constitutionality of this bill, supported by the written opinion of the Department of Justice, that the bill is certainly unconstitutional as applied to a taxing district engaged wholly in a public or governmental function.

I asked the witnesses on cross-examination, some of whom were presumed to be or at least tried to qualify as constitutional experts, what the line of distinction or cleavage was between a taxing district engaged in a governmental function and one in a proprietorial function; and I failed to get a single intelligent answer to that question from any witness who appeared before the committee.

There is no line of distinction. The State of Ohio may hold that a taxing district is exercising purely a governmental function. The State of Indiana may hold that a similar taxing district is engaged wholly in a private function.

I understand that the bill is predestined to become a law, and the only reason I am taking the valuable time of the Senate is to call attention to the future results of this measure, which I shall watch with much interest.

I do not know how bond buyers and trustees and guardians and administrators and insane persons, minors, and aged persons are going to know whether or not the bonds which they purchase come within the purview of this statute; and no one will ever be able to tell us by reason of the fact that there is no line of cleavage or distinction between the two governmental functions.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Perhaps I missed the able Senator's assignment of reasons for the alleged unconstitutionality of the proposed legislation. Will the Senator from Indiana indicate the basis of the constitutional argument by the Attorney General, or other attorneys, against the validity of the proposed statute?

Mr. VAN NUYS. The subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the House asked for an opinion from the Department of Justice, and an opinion was written by Mr. Weston, as I remember the name. I can give the Senator the conclusion of his argument.

> In my opinion, the private or proprietary capacity of a municipality is sufficiently distinct and definite to bring it within the purview of the bankruptcy power of Congress where the State, as the representative of the municipality's governmental functions, has given its consent.

I remember a case in Wisconsin which I looked up in which the municipality by virtue of a certain statute or ordinance—I do not know which—was conducting a public wood yard. There could be little question but what the municipality was acting in a private or proprietorial capacity as distinguished in the opinion of the Department of Justice; but in the case of hundreds upon hundreds of other political subdivisions there is no way of telling, I will say to the Senator from Colorado, except by means of adjudication, whether they are engaged in a governmental function or in the exercise of private pursuit.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator in the very able presentation which he is making of his views on this bill, but I desire to ask him a question. Is it not a fact that, whether this bill is constitutional or not, it is an immoral bill, which ought to be entitled "An act to authorize the repudiation of debts by any public municipality", and furthermore, it imposes an intolerable hardship on the credit of municipalities, such as, for example, in my own State, St. Louis, Kansas City, Springfield, and Joplin, which have maintained solvency by virtue of careful management and by dint of great hardship and struggle, and which are still solvent, their bonds selling above par? Is not this measure designed to put an intolerable hardship upon them in obtaining credit in the future?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I thank the Senator from Missouri. I had made the observation, possibly before he entered the Chamber, that, in my opinion, the enactment of this measure into law will adversely affect every solvent municipal political subdivision in this whole country of ours.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I have heard quite frequently the word "solvent" and the word "insolvent" mentioned in connection with municipalities. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana if it is possible for a municipality to be insolvent so long as it has the taxing power and has not exhausted its taxing power?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I thank the Senator from Kentucky very much, indeed, for that observation. This bill provides that the petition shall allege that the municipality is either "insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature." Personally I cannot conceive of any circumstance or condition when a political subdivision, such as a municipality, can be insolvent so long as there is a square foot of taxable property left within its confines.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Is not the expression which the Senator has just quoted the very first safeguard in this whole proceeding? The mere allegation that a municipality is insolvent does not create its insolvency. The fact must be established.

Mr. VAN NUYS. May I ask of the learned Senator, How can the insolvency of a municipality be established?

Mr. McCARRAN. When it fails to pay its current obligations when they are due, and that is a matter for the court to determine in the first instance.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. We have already destroyed the mortgage-bond market for farms and destroyed the mortgage-bond market for homes. Why not let us destroy the bond market for municipalities, too? Why discriminate?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I thank the Senator from Virginia. I think such destruction will be the direct result of the passage of this legislation.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, does the Senator from Virginia mean we are taking too much time in getting to our end?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I understand that this bill is destined to pass. I have perhaps already taken too much of the valuable time of the Senate, but I want to go on record, and I propose to follow up the workings of this measure, if it shall be enacted into law, until the next session, and then again call the attention of the Members of the Senate to it, for I think it will prove to be in its affect on solvent communities in this country about as disastrous a measure as could be passed by the Congress of the United States.

I care not who is behind this proposed legislation; I care not who has been called to the telephone here and been whipped into line for the passage of this iniquitous bill; personally, I would rather retain my self-respect, my loyalty to my own people, and my adherence to my convictions than to be registered among the favored few who have been whipped into line by any departmental telephone calls while we are in session here trying to do our duty.

Mr. GORE and Mr. McCARRAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I yield first to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I just entered the Chamber a moment ago. The Senator seems to have been addressing himself to the subject of municipal bankruptcy, and this bill extends, in effect, the bankruptcy laws to municipalities. Does it permit a State to declare its insolvency and take advantage of this proposed act?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that it does not.

Mr. GORE. Is that to be the next step in its evolution or revolution or devolution?

Mr. VAN NUYS. In my opinion, that is to be the next step. The Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. GORE. Before the scheme is to be consummated, is the United States Government to be permitted to enter some justice court and declare its insolvency?

Mr. VAN NUYS. As I understand, that is the third degree, I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I have always been against the third degree. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am very much interested in the last remark made by my good friend, the very able Senator from Indiana, and I am wondering if when he used the words "called to the telephone and whipped into line" he had in his mind some recent event other than that which applies to this particular bill?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I cannot speak, I will say to the Senator from Nevada, from personal knowledge, because I consider it one of the highest compliments I have had since being a Member of this distinguished body never to have been called to the telephone for the purpose of being whipped into line, and I hope that I never shall be.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. We have been speaking of the effect of this measure upon the securities of solvent cities. I think it will be conceded that if we can pass this measure requiring 75 percent of the security holders to approve, we could pass a measure which would require only 50 percent to approve, or we could pass a measure which would require only 25 percent to take such action.

Mr. VAN NUYS. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. How will the security holders be able to know where and when this kind of legislation is going to end, because it may be necessary the next year or the year following that to cut down the number which may be required to initiate such proceedings, and we will have a measure here under which 25 percent or 50 percent will be able to control the situation.

Mr. VAN NUYS. I agree with the Senator from Idaho. A question was asked here this morning, and I think improperly answered, as to the rights of minorities. I have heard so much about recalcitrant minorities that I am a little fed up on that subject, but the question was asked whether a minority would be bound by the confirmation and final decree of the court, whether they evidenced their claims, whether they ever appeared in court or ever had a day in court. The answer to that question was not properly given this morning, as I know. I think probably the question was asked by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. The Senator from Idaho has asked a very pertinent question, and I do not think that my distinguished friend the Senator from Indiana has answered it. The Senator from Idaho, if I correctly understood him, inquired when this legislation will end. The operation of the law, so far as instituting proceedings is concerned, is limited to 2 years.

Mr. BORAH. What I am saying is that, while under the bill 75 percent approval is necessary, ultimately we could pass a bill—next year if the situation seemed to demand it—requiring the approval of only 30 percent or 40 percent. Is not that true?

Mr. NEELY. If we can pass this one, we could manifestly pass another providing a lower degree of approval on the part of the creditors.

Mr. BORAH. I was simply presenting it as a legal question.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. On page 3 there seem to be stated alternative conditions upon which a petition may be filed. One is where the taxing district is insolvent. I take that to mean a present inability to meet existing debts; I take that to be insolvency. Then it goes on and provides, as a second alternative, "or unable to meet its debts as they mature." I take it that means something different than the insolvency just previously mentioned. What troubles me is whether that provision has reference of the future, whether a municipality or a taxing unit which anticipated a future inability to meet its obligations as they might mature could petition for this relief. Is that what is meant?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I should rather think, I will say to the Senator from Maine, that this bill provides that the court may require, in place of a schedule, which is usually filed by a voluntary bankrupt, a statement of the business and fiscal and financial affairs of the municipality. I should think it meant the existence of a present situation rather than an anticipated one.

Mr. WHITE. Then it is just stating the same thing in two different ways.

Mr. VAN NUYS. I think so. Personally I cannot see why the author of this bill ever put in the allegation of insolvency, because it is so antagonistic to our conceptions of the responsibility of governmental units. The bankruptcy statute, as we all know, is one of the oldest forms of law we have. We adopted in the Constitution the interpretation of bankruptcy laws as defined in the old common law; but there is no country in the world that has ever included a municipality or any governmental unit within the purview of a court of bankruptcy. It is so antagonistic to all elementary academic theories of good government that a sovereignty should ever repudiate its indebtedness or compose with its creditors for less than 100 cents on the dollar that no government in the world has ever contemplated or written into a bankruptcy statute the idea of a political subdivision of a State or the sovereignty itself being able to take advantage of the provisions of a bankruptcy law. This is the first such instance to my knowledge. I recognize that Canada has certain regulatory bodies, but I am talking about bankruptcy laws.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. This is the first time in the history of the Government that we ever had anything similar to our present National Recovery Administration, because of the fact that this is the first time that we ever needed it. Similarly, this is the first time that 2,019 taxing districts in the United States have been insolvent, and have consequently needed this legislation.

Mr. VAN NUYS. As compared to the 250,000 to 400,000 political subdivisions that will be affected by this measure, the 2,000 political subdivisions in default to me represent a very small percentage of the total. I think, under the theory of the Minnesota moratorium law, it is up to the States to take care of their particular communities. I referred to Florida when a number of Senators who are now in the Chamber were not present. Millions of dollars, some of it my money and some of it yours, went down there. With that money gathered throughout the United States public improvements were built all over the State of Florida without a word or a warning from the officials of that State. The burden is on the State of Florida, by a revolving fund, direct relief, or any other measure that they may see fit to employ, to take care of their suffering municipalities.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. Is it not also true that practically every great corporation which has erected buildings in New York and Chicago and San Francisco, and which is under present law permitted to go into bankruptcy, has sold its stocks and its bonds in Indiana, West Virginia, and various other States in the Union?

Mr. VAN NUYS. That is true.

Mr. NEELY. Is the situation with reference to a municipal corporation conspicuously different in principle from a similar situation concerning a private corporation?

Mr. VAN NUYS. It is entirely different. When the Senator buys bonds of some great corporation in New York City he has a prospectus of the business, and he buys with his eyes wide open, knowing that there may be some individual mismanagement or fraud or defalcation; but when he loans money to the city of Indianapolis, with its 400,000 patriotic, fine citizens, men and women, he loans it to that city with the understanding that every inch of property within the confines of that capital city of the State of Indiana will be exhausted before the city will ask him to scale down that obligation even by 1 percent. There is a vast distinction, a pronounced line of cleavage between buying the obligations of private industry and buying the obligations of a public corporation.

Mr. NEELY. But is there not the same sort of implied understanding on the part of the purchaser of a bond of a private corporation? Every dollar's worth of the corporation's property may be sold in satisfaction of its bonds.

Mr. VAN NUYS. Behind the private investment there is not the good faith, good will, and the confidence of every American citizen in his Government as there is behind the obligations of a municipality or a State or the Federal Government. There is a striking line of distinction.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. VAN NUYS. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I am not a lawyer, and my question may seem a very simple one to the distinguished Senator, who is a lawyer. Does not the bankruptcy law require a person who goes into bankruptcy to surrender all his property?

Mr. VAN NUYS. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. Are the municipalities going to surrender all their property?

Mr. VAN NUYS. They will surrender nothing whatsoever, I will say to the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Then, what is to be the standard of insolvency? A court in my State might hold that a given community should levy a certain percentage of taxes, and a court in the Senator's State might hold that a given community should levy another percentage. What is to be the standard of insolvency?

Mr. VAN NUYS. The agreement, as I understand, would be determined by 75 percent of the creditors. If 75 percent of the creditors of a municipality in the State of Virginia should agree on 50 percent of the principal of the obligation, that would not prevent 75 percent of the creditors of a municipality in Indiana agreeing on 20 percent or 10 percent. There is no uniformity about the bill at all.

Mr. President, as part of my remarks, I ask that the minority views of the subcommittee be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the minority views were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINORITY VIEWS

A minority of the Senate Judiciary Committee, to which was referred H.R. 5950, to amend the Bankruptcy Act of 1898, as amended and supplemented, feels that such bill ought to be rejected.

The recommendation that such bill be rejected is based upon two propositions: First, that said bill is unconstitutional; second, that the policy of enacting such legislation is ill-advised.

In support of the position taken by said minority of said subcommittee, it is respectfully submitted that the constitutionality of said bill has been the subject of prolonged and highly controversial discussion. It is the opinion of the undersigned that the weight of the authorities is to the effect that the bill is unconstitutional.

It is proposed by this legislation that any municipality or other political subdivision of any State, including any county, city, borough, village, parish, town, or township, unincorporated tax or special assessment district, and any school, drainage, irrigation, levee, sewer or paving, sanitary, port, improvement, or other districts may file petitions in courts of bankruptcy stating that the taxing district is insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature and that it is desirous of effecting a plan of readjustment of its debts upon the basis of its capacity to pay. Subject to numerous conditions contained in the bill, the judge of the United States district court may approve or disapprove the petition and the plan for refunding the debts of the petitioning municipality. If the plan be approved, the final decree of said court shall discharge the taxing district from those debts and liabilities dealt with in the plan, and upon such confirmation the provisions of the plan and of the order of confirmation shall be binding upon (1) the taxing district, and (2) all creditors, secured or unsecured, whether or not affected by the plan, and whether or not their claims shall have been filed or evidenced, and if filed or evidenced, whether or not allowed, including creditors who have not, as well as those who have, accepted it. It is submitted that the grant of above powers to a court of bankruptcy is an interference with the powers, rights, and privileges of the sovereign States.

It is academic to suggest that the political units named in the bill are subdivisions of and agencies of the State. Such subdivisions and agencies are created by the State to carry out, in given localities, the business and functions of the State. Their authority is limited to the powers granted them under the constitution of the State, its statutes, or by charter. Such powers must be exercised in strict compliance with such grants of power. Upon no other theory could the delegation of the power to tax, being a legislative function, be delegated to such political units.

By this bill the Federal courts are empowered to revise and recast the debts and obligations of the subordinate governmental agencies of the States. They are empowered to alter and nullify the laws theretofore enacted by the States and the ordinances of the States' subordinate governmental agencies exercising the power of taxation. It proposes to discharge the municipality and its officers from the duty imposed by State law to levy taxes to pay the debts and obligations of the municipality. These tax levies once fixed become liens which should not be interfered with nor nullified by Federal governmental action.

The opinion of the Attorney General's office rendered to the Judiciary Committee of the House attempts to draw a distinction between the proprietary and public capacities of a municipality and concludes as follows:

"In my opinion the private or proprietary capacity of a municipality is sufficiently distinct and definite to bring it within the purview of the bankruptcy power of Congress where the State, as the representative of the municipality's governmental functions, has given its consent."

It developed at the hearings that there is no recognized or uniform line of cleavage determining when a municipal unit is acting in a private or proprietary capacity and when it is functioning in a public or governmental capacity. Such distinction is purely of judicial origin to relieve the harsh rule denying recovery against municipalities for negligence of inferior officers and servants in the performance of duties connected with certain public activities. It has no application to the income, property, contracts, debts, bonds, appropriations, or tax levies for such public activities.

It is impossible to envisage a sovereign State as subject to bankruptcy courts. The power of the States and their subordinate governmental agencies to borrow money, incur obligations, and fix tax levies is essentially a function of the sovereign States, legislative in nature, and cannot be delegated to the judicial branches of the States, much less to the judicial branches of a foreign sovereignty.

In view of the above facts, the undersigned are of the opinion that the Federal Government is without power or authority to exercise jurisdiction over or interfere with the sovereign States or their subdivisions and agencies as provided in H.R. 5950.

THE POLICY OF THE BILL

After thorough public hearings and investigation, the undersigned are of the further opinion that, in the ground of policy as well as legality, the bill ought to be rejected.

As set out in the report of the committee on commercial law and bankruptcy of the American Bar Association, which report was unanimously adopted by the association at its annual meeting in 1933—

"The inevitable results of the operation of municipal bankruptcy must be to depress the market for municipal securities and seriously impair the credit of cities in sound financial position."

To this opinion we subscribe. Even proponents of this legislation have been candid enough to admit that the passage of either of the bills under discussion would affect the credit of solvent cities, would act as a drag on the sale of municipal securities, and might demand a higher rate of interest on such securities. In all probability only a comparatively small percent of municipalities will take advantage of the provisions of the bills if enacted, yet the presence of the law on the statute books would, in the opinion of the undersigned, cost investors and solvent municipalities millions of dollars.

Municipal securities have always been considered gilt-edge investments. They have ranked second only to the obligations of the Federal and State Governments. Probate courts have for generations authorized and directed guardians, trustees, and administrators to invest the trust funds under their control in municipal securities. The American Legion Endowment Fund Corporation now has approximately four and one-half million dollars invested in the bonds of municipalities and other political units. The capital of this corporation was contributed by public-spirited citizens all over the United States for the purpose of creating an income which is expended solely for the rehabilitation and child welfare in connection with the veterans of the World War. The officers of this fund are strongly opposed to the passage of this legislation. The funds of scores of fraternal-insurance orders are similarly invested and such fraternal orders have gone on record as opposed to the bill.

The testimony taken at the hearings did not develop the fact that this legislation was necessary to avoid universal repudiation of municipal debts. While no witness seemed possessed of very accurate information on the subject, it was stated by the different witnesses that from 250,000 to 400,000 taxing districts would be potentially subject to this legislation. It is further safe to assume that approximately 2,000 of such units are in default in the payment of principal or interest, or both, on their obligations at this time. It is further agreed that there are outstanding approximately $20,000,000,000 of such municipal securities. In the face of such facts it surely cannot be argued that legislation of this character is universally demanded.

The most insistent demand for this legislation comes from cities which were overdeveloped during boom days, when real-estate prices were pyramided and unreasonable and wholly unwarranted public improvements were projected upon such pyramided values. While it is palpable that such cities are at this time seriously involved, it is the duty of the State to come to the relief of such communities rather than to involve the faith and credit of the tens of thousands of solvent municipalities throughout the entire country by the passage of such Federal legislation as is here demanded. It is quite evident from the decision in the case of Home Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell, rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States on January 8, 1934, that the State, through proper legislation, may declare such moratoria as may afford temporary relief to certain of its political subdivisions. It may also provide for direct relief to such municipalities and other political subdivisions. If this be true, we question the propriety of the Federal Government entering into the legislation contemplated by the bills under consideration.

Many reliable parties in interest have very frankly and fearlessly expressed themselves as opposed to this legislation. Among such opponents, may we cite the following:

1. American Bar Association.
2. American Bankers Association.
3. Chamber of Commerce of the United States.
4. National Fraternal Congress, representing fraternal societies with 8,000,000 members.
5. National Association of Credit Men, representing 20,000 manufacturing, wholesaling, and banking institutions.
6. Pennsylvania Fraternal Congress.
7. Ohio Chamber of Commerce.
8. Tacoma Chamber of Commerce.
9. Pennsylvania Fraternal Congress, having a constituency of 36 fraternal societies.
10. Polish Association of America, Milwaukee.
11. Junior Order of American Mechanics, Philadelphia.
12. New England Fraternal Congress.
13. Maryland Fraternal Congress.
14. Wisconsin Fraternal Congress.
15. Western Catholic Union, Peoria, Ill.
16. Degree of Honor Protective Association, St. Paul.
17. Ben Hur Life Association, having $8,000,000 in municipal bonds, Crawfordsville, Ind.
18. Association of Indiana Legal Reserve Life Insurance Companies, having $27,000,000 invested in municipal securities.
19. Ancient Order of United Workmen, having $10,500,000 invested in municipal bonds, Newton, Kans.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, 3 or 4 years ago the then administration recommended to the Congress a general revision of the Bankruptcy Act. I introduced a bill for that purpose in the Senate, and was subsequently made chairman of a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary which considered the various recommendations that were made. On that subcommittee were the former Senator from New Mexico, Mr. Bratton, the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. Hebert, and myself. We had long hearings upon the general subject, and heard from various people interested.

It will be remembered that up to that time the bankruptcy law provided that before a person could be declared a bankrupt he must be insolvent; that is, his liabilities must exceed his assets. In the bill which I introduced at that time there were three particular features which were entirely new. One related to the individual debtor, one to railroad corporations, and the other related to other corporate debtors. It was sought to widen the jurisdiction with respect to bankruptcies by declaring that persons insolvent should come under it as under the old law, as well as persons who were unable to meet their debts as they matured. In most jurisdictions—so far as I know, in all jurisdictions—in the matter of the appointment of receivers for corporations it is necessary only to allege with respect to them that they are unable to meet their debts as they mature.

In this new measure it was sought, because of the depression, to relieve the individual debtor of ever having it said against him that he had gone through bankruptcy; so that new proposed legislation, which was subsequently enacted by the Congress, called him a "debtor" if he were trying to make a settlement with his creditors rather than to distribute all of his assets to his creditors.

The same provision was made with respect to railroads and with respect to other corporations. It was late in the session before any of these matters could be considered; and the Judiciary Committee of the Senate recommended that provision with respect to the individual debtor and recommended it with respect to the railroads because they were impressed with the great necessity of some such relief.

Not until the time those bills were being considered did I ever hear it suggested that a municipality might come within the provisions of the Constitution. There was some talk about it during those hearings, particularly, as I recollect, from the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and perhaps from some other sources; but so far as I was concerned I did not take it seriously, because I assumed that nobody would expect the Congress, after seriously considering the matter, to take any such drastic step as that.

Some time later—as I recollect, during the past session of the Congress—we had special meetings with respect to municipalities. We heard the then mayor of Detroit, Mr. Murphy, and we heard many other witnesses, most of them from bond houses that had tried to get some adjustment of some bond issue. But, Mr. President, as I read the provision of the Constitution which gives to the Congress the power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States, and as I heard the mayor of Detroit tell what their financial condition was and then remembered his answer when I asked him at what amount the physical property of Detroit was assessed, it seemed to me those two matters themselves showed conclusively that we could not undertake to fit this sort of legislation into the provision of the Constitution without violating at least the spirit of the Constitution and that which was intended when the provision was adopted and became the fundamental law of the land.

I thoroughly agree that, wherever possible in any of the difficulties that have been explained here today, the Congress or the State or anybody else ought to put a city or municipality in the position of compelling a small minority to agree to that which is evidently for the benefit of all. In other words, no person is entirely satisfied to let some minority, for some ulterior purpose, hold up the development of any great plan such as would have to be developed in disposing of some of these municipal difficulties.

I appreciate how serious the situation is for the State of Michigan or the municipalities of the State of Michigan. I know, without his saying so, how very much interested the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] is in those municipalities. When he addresses the Senate upon this subject, he distinctly states that he does not do it from a constitutional point of view, but does it from a practical point of view; and then he asked me, if I could eliminate the question of constitutionality, whether I would agree generally with the bill.

I could not answer that question. I am not certain what I would do under such circumstances; but before taking my seat I do propose to point out some practical difficulties, even though this bill be within the terms of the Constitution itself.

Before doing so, however, I desire to discuss for a moment what a shocking thing it must be to reasonable people everywhere to find subdivisions of a State government, made subdivisions of the State government by the State itself, being put in a position in opposition to what the State may want to have done, in opposition to and doing what the State would not have permitted them to do if it could help it; in fact, the State would not have permitted the subdivision to be created unless it believed, at the time of its creation, that the State had absolute control over what the subdivision might or might not do. Such, for instance, as limitation upon the amount of indebtedness it may incur.

In other words, when my State creates the municipality of the city of Wilmington, it limits its authority, and places upon it certain burdens that go along with the authority that has been given to it. Now the Federal Government comes along—assuming this measure to be constitutional—and says to my State, "It matters not what limitations you placed upon that subdivision, created in your State by your own authority. It does not make any difference that the Federal Congress was not in a position to give that authority to the municipality. That counts for nothing. We admit that you had the absolute authority yourself. It was within your rights as a State to give it or withhold it, depending upon what you wanted to do. It was within your absolute right, when you gave it, to impose upon it such conditions as you believed it necessary to impose upon a subdivision of your State government. We admit that you had that absolute authority; but along in the year 1934, because we find a great depression in the land, we go back to the original Constitution which you approved, and of which you are a part, and we find hidden in it a sentence which we believe we can fit into the new situation caused by this depression. Regardless of what your opinion may be as to what we ought to do, regardless of the effect it may have upon your State if we do this particular thing and give this particular authority to the municipality, we say, in view of the depression, in view of the great emergency, that we must give that child of yours the authority to repudiate its debt if it likes. We must give it the authority to reduce it by 50 percent if it likes. We must give it the authority to do anything that 75 percent of those who have trusted it are willing to permit it to do. We are content to give that authority to the municipality, and we do it despite anything you may say to the contrary."

That, however, is not the only authority given in this bill. Here is created a State, and at the same time that it is created, by its very constitution there are created counties in the State. Those counties have fixed boundaries, fixed by the State constitution. The legislature itself cannot change them. Here is a separate government, a subdivision of the State, with full authority to levy taxes upon the people of the county, and with full authority to collect those taxes despite any mortgage or other obligation that may be on the property. We find that particular county at a time when all things are prosperous and there is apparently no danger of a depression anywhere, living in extravagance, building more roads than it has any right to build, building more schools than it can pay for, bonding the county beyond all reason. Then when the depression comes, when the farmers of the county find they cannot meet their obligations as they become due, we find the delinquent tax list constantly growing, and those in control say, "We dare not disturb our people here. They have all been suffering dreadfully from the depression. We cannot force them to pay taxes now without greatly injuring and probably destroying them, and certainly greatly distressing them. What shall we, the taxing power in this county, do under those circumstances? Shall we insist upon them paying notwithstanding the hardship which would follow, or shall we say that this county can no longer pay the interest on its bonds? Why should we not take the easier course, and say that it will not pay? Here are the people at home who voted for us in this district. They are the people who keep us in this particular office. Why should we not favor them when they are in distress, rather than favor some institution in New York or Boston or some other city which holds the bonds of this particular county?"

It seems to me, Mr. President, that when we compare those two, we are going to see the thing that is inevitable; notwithstanding the optimistic view of the Senator from Michigan, when this thing happens we are going to see the 2,019 mount rapidly to 10 times that, and why?

The Senator says there is no danger because the county to which I have referred is doing the best it can; it is, like the city of Detroit, struggling with all its might to get itself out of its difficulty, and there is no danger. I will show, then, what is the danger. If the officials do not do as has been suggested, when the next election comes around those in office will be thrown out, and somebody else will do that thing. That is the trouble with this situation; there is mixed in it from the very beginning to the end the political psychology.

I am surprised, shocked, and ashamed to know that the city of Wilmington ever entered into this proposition to have the city of Wilmington repudiate its bonds. That demonstrates to me that there is no necessity for a lot of the things that are going on here. The city of Wilmington is suffering? Of course it is suffering; it is suffering as every other city is suffering. But the city of Wilmington will compel its people to pay the taxes necessary to enable it to meet its obligations, and let nobody be deceived about that.

They will do that unless this bill is enacted, and if the bill shall be enacted, the same people who are running it now—and they are good Democrats, at that—unless they do yield to the demand that is made upon them to repudiate the debt, so that it may be settled for 95 percent, or 90, or 80, or 75 cents on the dollar, or what not, unless they yield, in the next election, a year from next June, we will find that the mayor of the city will go his way, and that the city council will go their way, because, I say, there will be enough people, even in my own town, who will be willing to say to those in charge, "Instead of making us pay our taxes, you could reduce them by repudiating the city's debt, and let somebody on the outside suffer."

Mr. President, I think I have exaggerated that. I am not quite willing yet to believe that that would be done, but I am saying this, that just as certainly as that I stand here it would be an issue in the next city campaign in my State. Immediately that issue would be brought to the front, instead of any other issue, and it would be that issue upon which the poor taxpayer, who had had difficulty in paying his taxes, would have his interest centered.

Mr. President, in the consideration of this question, there is a distinction between these city and county authorities and those of the State and Nation, The Government may repudiate its whole debt, and there is nothing anybody can do about it. A State, so far as I know, can repudiate its entire debt, and there is nothing anybody can do about it. That is the only reason, so far as I know, for not including the State and Federal Governments within the terms of the bill now pending before the Senate. It is the only excuse I know.

When first there was talk about including municipalities and counties in this measure, I said to myself, "If we do that, the next will be the State. We shall next be including State authority, and letting the States go into bankruptcy." But I think that is not true, because now there is nothing to compel a State to meet its obligations, except its own pride, and its own desire to negotiate bonds in the future.

With respect to the counties and with respect to the cities, they can do exactly what is being done in Pontiac, Mich.,

now, and in that action in Michigan which is distressing the city of Pontiac they have gone into court to compel the authorities to include in their 1934 budget an amount of money sufficient to pay the interest on these particular bonds.

Suppose the authority is granted, and suppose the court in Michigan makes the order. Then what is going to happen? The case is before the courts of Michigan. The authority, I assume, is there. Why it has not been exercised, I suppose, is because they have not reached it. But what will happen if they do it? Is Pontiac, Mich., going to pay its bonds, or is it not?

I do not know what is going to happen, but so far as I see, if the court makes the order and they cannot collect the money, that will end it. I do not know what the court is going to do about it. If they make the order and can collect the money, then I suppose the bond interest will be paid. I do not know anything else that can happen.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I presume that if the court should make an order directing the members of the city council to levy a tax sufficient to meet the current obligations, and the city council should refuse, they might be cited for contempt. There have been a number of instances, in Kansas and other States, where bonds were issued to aid in the construction of railroads, by counties, and in some instances, I understand, by municipalities, and when the bonds matured the cities and the counties refused to meet the obligations. One of the cases went to the Supreme Court, and it was held, as I recall it, that there was a valid obligation, and in some instances members of the city council were cited for contempt when they refused to levy the taxes, and in some instances they resigned rather than levy the taxes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What will happen when the court issues this order to which the Senator refers probably will be that a tax levy will be required, which the city of Pontiac will be unable to pay, inasmuch as its tax delinquency went up to 57 percent in 1933. Thereupon the city of Pontiac will have one of two alternatives, either to default completely and give up any thought or purpose of paying its bondholders anything or to take money out of funds now used to maintain police, fire, health, education, and welfare service and pay it instead on the debt service. When that shall be done, I submit to the Senator—when public safety, public welfare, public education, are impaired for the purpose of paying the bondholders—the municipality will be on the road to utter disintegration, and the bondholders' net equity will be utterly destroyed.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I do not know of any place where that has happened. I doubt whether in these 2,019 cases which have been cited any such thing as that has happened. Usually public opinion takes care of that situation; and if a city is doing its very best, the public opinion will sustain them in doing that which is first necessary.

Mr. VANDANBERG. Mr. President, can the Senator conceive a public opinion in any municipality in this country which would permit the abandonment of the economic necessities of public health and safety for the purpose of maintaining debt service?

Mr. HASTINGS. No.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And should it subordinate public safety to debt service?

Mr. HASTINGS. Certainly not.

Mr. VANDENBERG. When it faces that contingency why should there not be a legal formula to work the way out, to the mutual advantage of all concerned?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I think I have suggested to the Senator from Michigan a very much better formula than the pending one, and one which would be very much better controlled. I suggested and asked him the question, having in mind the Minnesota case decided by the Supreme Court, whether it was not possible for the legislatures of the various States, where municipalities are in distress, to provide by law that those municipalities might declare a moratorium for a certain period, and make it perfectly legal.

The distinguished Senator replied to that that the opposition to it was that there would be 48 different kinds of remedy. My answer to that was that, so far as I am concerned, I would rather have the legislature of my own State provide the remedy for the municipalities in my own State, because they know what the situation is, they know it better than the Congress can possibly know it, and, knowing the legislature as I know it, and the city of Wilmington, which was referred to by the Senator from Michigan, I know that they never would get the authority.

If the situation is as bad as it seems to be, and I am quite certain it is in Michigan, I cannot understand why it is not possible for these distressed municipalities to apply directly to the State of Michigan and make their own requests of that legislature for the specific authority they need, and it makes no difference to the State of Michigan or to its municipalities whether that relief granted by the legislature of the State of Michigan is different from that of some other State or not, because it meets their local situation, and that ought to be satisfactory to them.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But the Senator overlooks the fact that the fundamental argument made against this bill is that it will affect the ability to market and the market valuations of municipal bonds. I ask the Senator whether the great municipal bond market of the country would not be far more greatly distressed by being confronted with the possibility of 48 different State rules of moratorium in lieu of 1 general rule of the nature here proposed, which is contingent upon the known demand of 75 percent of the creditors?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, so far as the value of municipal bonds is concerned it is the least thing about this bill that disturbs me. Whether it will increase them or decrease them is not the thing that disturbs me. What does disturb me is that the Congress is going into the States of the Union and undertaking to control the subdivisions of the States of the Union with respect to this public debt. That is the outrageous thing in this bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator realizes, of course, that there are limitations in the Constitution as to the powers of the States, and no such limitation applies to the power of Congress. The States cannot do anything that may be construed to be in violation of their contracts. That does not apply to Congress. That is one distinction.

The Senator says that the courts have the power to mandamus the municipalities and compel them to levy an assessment. What would the Senator think of the exercise of that power when in one instance the court has required an assessment of 425 mills in order to meet the interest on bonds and so forth? Four hundred and twenty-five mills—42½ percent of the actual value of the property! In other words, the taxpayer would sacrifice his entire property in 2 years if he met the requirements of the mandamus.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is it or is it not true that the particular city which the Senator has in mind received any benefit from the funds when it sold these bonds that he speaks of which require 42½ cents assessment to pay? Did the city ever get anything? If so, what became of it? Did it increase the value of its property, or what happened to the money? That is the serious thing.

There is another side to this question besides that of the municipality. There is the side of the persons who paid their money, and which money the municipalities wasted, and we all know that. Are we going to encourage the municipalities to keep on spending more than they ought to spend, because sometime they will have an opportunity to come in and repudiate their obligation, or are we going to compel them to spend with great care or they are going to have a court order on them if they undertake to repudiate their debt?

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say to the Senator in answer to his question that these municipalities, like individuals all over the country in days past, were living extravagantly; they were spending more money than they ought to spend, just as the individuals did. Prices were high. They had no difficulty about selling their bonds or other securities.

There has been a change, however, in that situation. In one city I know the valuation of the property was $100,000,000 when its bonds were issued, but the valuation of that property today is $17,000,000. There has been a decline in values everywhere since 1929 and 1930, which has in many cases wiped out the ability of cities to pay. The people are not able to pay the taxes. They got the benefits from the bonds. For the sake of the argument, we will say they used the money to pave their streets, to build sidewalks, to put in electric-light plants and power plants, and all that sort of thing, but they overspent; they spent more than they ought to have spent, and now they are retrenching in the administration of the affairs of the cities as much as possible.

The mayor of one town was up here a few days ago appealing for the passage of this bill. He said:

> We would not have been able to keep the weeds out of our streets if it were not for the C.W.A. Bondholders have mandamused the city and seized every resource the city has. We have not the money to pay our firemen and our policemen.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I say frankly that if it were not for the fact that it would result in encouraging cities in the future to disregard their obligations—in other words, if we could limit this obligation to a certain fixed time within a month or two—I should be willing to forego my objection to it in order to aid these distressed cities.

I have another objection. I am opposed to the Federal Government doing that which will permit a person to repudiate his contract merely because the State government which created that particular subdivision cannot, under the Constitution, give that right to that municipality. In other words, there must be some reason for placing in the Constitution the provision which prevents a State from passing any law which will repudiate its contract. That was put there for a specific purpose.

In the Minnesota case we have the Constitution, it seems to me, stretched to the very limit, in which case it has been held that a moratorium might be declared for a certain period in that particular State. It was urged that that was a violation of the provision of the Constitution previously referred to, but the Supreme Court said that in view of the emergency it would hold that it was a perfectly good law.

The proposition that I am opposed to is that the Federal Government shall take a position and impose it upon creditors of the municipalities of the Nation, merely because the State has no such authority to do that. It seems to me that is a distressing argument to make even in a time of depression.

Mr. President, I do not want to delay the Senate with respect to this bill. I just wanted to make these observations with respect to it. I wanted to say that in my judgment, regardless of the opinion of the Attorney General, which is certainly not very strong in favor of this measure, the Constitution, which gives to the Congress the authority to legislate with respect to bankruptcies, did not have any intention of permitting us to include in such legislation the subdivisions of the various States, such as counties and the municipalities.

I do not believe it was intended that we should interfere with that particular right of the State in any way. I think we are violating that right of the State. I think we are violating that provision when we pass this bill assuming it to be constitutional.

Secondly and lastly, I think it is a dangerous thing to throw this kind of a controversy into the political machines of the various municipalities of this country.

I have in mind in particular the city of New York, which is greatly distressed. We read the New York newspapers every day, and we see what is being done or what is trying to be done there to meet the various needs of the city. But, Mr. President, if we let it alone the city of New York will not repudiate a single dollar of its bonds, in my judgment. If we pass this bill immediately everyone whom they are now trying to persuade to pay a tax and everyone who is opposing any new tax in the city of New York will hold up his hands in horror to the administration in New York and say, "Instead of levying these new taxes, why do you not say to the people holding these bonds, 'You will give us an extension or you will reduce the amount of these bonds.'"

That is the situation we are going to have in New York. That is the situation we are going to have in all of these large cities which are hard pressed.

APPOINTMENTS UNDER HOME OWNERS' LOAN CORPORATION—ATTITUDE OF SENATOR NORRIS

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a few days ago, on the 25th day of April, we had up for discussion and action the conference report on the Federal Home Loan Corporation. I was opposed to the adoption of the conference report, because the conferees had left out of the bill as passed by the Senate a provision which provided that all the officials and agents and attorneys, and so forth, of the Corporation should be appointed and promoted without regard to partisan political affiliation. I do not intend now to discuss again the merits of that controversy; I look upon it as passed, and, while I think the action of the Senate and of the House of Representatives was wrong, I realize that the measure was passed by the proper majority, and that whoever was opposed to it, as I was, must submit to the will of that majority, which I do as gracefully as I know how. I am not finding fault with the other House or with the Senate in the action they took in finally rejecting the nonpartisan feature provided by the amendment which the Senate adopted to that bill. What I do object to and what I desire to call to the attention of the Senate is that in the debate the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] in their arguments left me, as I believe, before the Senate and the country in an entirely false attitude.

I realize that it is quite immaterial from the individual standpoint, but in the attitude that I had assumed on that occasion I was representing what I have stood for practically ever since I have been in public life; at least, ever since I have been in the House or in the Senate; and because anyone reading that debate would get a false impression of my attitude perhaps at some future time when my voice shall be stilled, I want now to place in the RECORD what I could not place in the RECORD on that day, because necessarily it is apparent that I could not anticipate what was going to be said and, therefore, was not prepared at least to offer anything for the RECORD on the subject in that debate.

The Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Kentucky placed me, as I have said, in what I believe to be an erroneous attitude. I take this opportunity, to begin with, to say that I am not attributing to either one of those Senators any unfair or any undue activity or with any intention of trying to place me in that kind of attitude. Each one of them said that he conceded I was sincere in my argument, but they both undertook to show that during my long experience in Congress of about 30 years that was really the first time I had ever endeavored to have any action by Congress that was of a nonpartisan nature, and that I was offering that amendment and arguing against the conference report as a partisan, and only at a time when my party was not in power, and that I had never taken such action when my party was in power.

I knew, of course, because I do know my own heart, that such assertions were entirely without foundation, and I am now going to show by the RECORD, so that future generations may read it, if they desire so to do, that it was very unjust on the part of those two Senators to attempt to place me in that kind of attitude.

During the course of that debate on the 25th day of April, when the Senator from West Virginia had the floor, he was interrupted by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], who said:

Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to permit me to read the provisions of the Norris joint resolution which was passed in the Seventy-second Congress, and vetoed by President Hoover, with reference to appointments in the Tennessee Valley under the Muscle Shoals Board, as it was then called?

Mr. NEELY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is as follows:

"The general manager"—

Then the Senator from Kentucky interpolated:

Prior to that language the bill authorized the appointment of a general manager—

The Senator from Kentucky then continued the reading of the joint resolution, as follows:

The general manager shall appoint, with the advice and consent of the board, two assistant managers who shall be responsible to him, and through him to the board. One of the assistant managers shall be a man possessed of knowledge, training, and experience to render him competent and expert in the production of fixed nitrogen. The other assistant manager shall be a man trained and experienced in the field of production and distribution of hydroelectric power. The general manager may at any time, for cause, remove any assistant manager, and appoint his successor as above provided. He shall immediately thereafter make a report of such action to the board, giving in detail the reason therefor. He shall employ, with the approval of the board, all other agents, clerks, attorneys, employees, and laborers.

Then the Senator from Kentucky said:

That is all there is about it.

If the Senator from Kentucky had continued to read, he would have found on the same page by just reading a few lines further in the joint resolution this language, referring to the board—

(g) May appoint such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents as are necessary for the transaction of its business, fix their compensation, define generally their duties, require bonds of them and fix the penalties thereof, and dismiss at pleasure any such officer, employee, attorney, or agent, and provide a system of organization to fix responsibility and promote efficiency.

It strikes me if the Senator from Kentucky wanted to be absolutely fair in his criticism of my attitude he would have at least read just a little further in that particular joint resolution; but I submit that while what the Senator read and what I have read went toward efficiency and nonpartisanship, it did not go, I concede, as far as the amendment offered by me to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation bill. However, it is not fair, Mr. President, to say that a measure that first passed the committee of the Senate, then the Senate, then the committee of the House of Representatives, then the House of Representatives, and then the conference committee necessarily expressed in its terms the complete ideas of the author of that bill. That is particularly true of the Muscle Shoals legislation. I shall show later that I put into some of the first bills I introduced on that subject language which went further than the language that was embodied in the conference report, but I also had in mind, I always knew that I had, to begin with, an unfriendly Senate, an unfriendly House, and an unfriendly President to the things that I wanted to have incorporated in the Muscle Shoals legislation.

I was, however, anxious to have a bill; I was anxious the President should sign it; and I made many compromises not only in this respect but many others, and left out sometimes provisions which I had learned were offensive to some Senators and to some Members of the other House, and particularly to the President himself, because, I repeat, I wanted to get legislation on the subject.

Sometime before the Senator from Kentucky read that extract from the joint resolution, he interrupted the Senator from West Virginia, as follows:

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator recall, during the 12 years of Republican control of the Government, any such amendment as this being offered from the other side on the part of anybody?

Mr. NEELY. Never; and since the distinguished Senator from Nebraska recently said that he had written to various departments during the 12 Republican years that preceded this administration, recommending that their appointments be nonpartisan, I have searched the record and had it searched for the full period that the Senator has served in this body, in a vain effort to find where the Senator from Nebraska, under a Republican administration, ever attempted as vigorously as he is attempting now to have a great governmental department made nonpartisan.

Mr. President, I would not pay any attention to that language if it were not so contradictory of my whole official life on a point about which I am perhaps unduly sensitive. From the beginning of my public service I have stood for nonpartisanship in matters of government where there was nothing involved but a business question. I have stood for that principle just as fervently and just as sincerely when my party was in power as when its opponents were in power. I want to leave in the RECORD proof of that statement for posterity.

I was very much disappointed and chagrined when those two Senators, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], by what they said on the floor put me in what I know to be an absolutely false attitude. I should not have been surprised if someone outside the Senate, whom I know in public life and otherwise, had done such a thing. I am used to that. I recognize that as something which has happened often and will probably happen often again, and that such an attempt will be made, successfully or unsuccessfully, with respect to all positions I have assumed or may assume on all public questions. But when those two Senators undertook to have the RECORD show such an attitude on my part I felt like wrapping my mantle about me and exclaiming, in words that were uttered in Rome centuries ago, "Et tu, Brute!" I would not have believed, if it had to come at all, that it would come from that source.

To correct the implication those words would leave on the mind of anyone who reads the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I have taken the floor this afternoon. There were some other things in the same discussion of that day bearing upon the same matter and in the same general tone.

First, let me take up the matter of Muscle Shoals legislation. That legislation was pending in Congress for a great many years. It came to the committee of which I was chairman, but not with my consent. It came by action of the Senate at a time when I asked the Senate to send the bill somewhere else. I knew then, I thought, enough about the question to believe there was a great deal of labor involved and a great many controversies which I wanted to avoid and keep out of if I could. But the Senate thought otherwise and when the bill was referred to my committee we took it up and I did then, as I have done many times, what I believed to be my duty. I did the best I could.

In 1922 when we had a Republican administration I introduced a Muscle Shoals bill. It was Senate bill 3420, and was introduced April 10, 1922. In that bill I provided as follows:

In the appointment of officials and the selection of employees for said corporation and in the promotion of such employees or officials no political test or qualifications shall be permitted or given consideration, but all such appointments and promotions shall be given and made on the basis of merit and efficiency. The board shall give publicity to any request, coming from any source, asking for any favor in behalf of any person or the promotion of any employee. Any member of said board who permits the use of political or partisan influence in the selection of any employee, or in the promotion of any such employee of said corporation, or who gives any consideration to political considerations in the official action of said board or who, knowing that such political influence has been or is attempted, does not give publicity to the same, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000 or imprisoned not exceeding 6 months, or both such fine and imprisonment, and the conviction of any member of said board of the offense herein defined shall have the effect of removing such member from office.

That is one thing shown by the record which the Senator in his search did not find. It was not difficult to find. It would have been easy to find it.

Again, on December 9, 1924, I introduced a bill on the same subject. In that bill will be found the following language:

In the appointment of officials and the selection of employees for said corporation and in the promotion of any such employees or officials no political test or qualifications shall be permitted or given consideration, but all such appointments and promotions shall be given and made on the basis of merit and efficiency. The board shall keep a record of all requests, oral and written, made to any member thereof, coming from any source, asking for any favor in behalf of any person or the promotion of any employee, which record shall be open to the public inspection. Any member of said board who permits the use of political or partisan influence in the selection of any employee, or in the promotion of any such employee of said corporation, or who gives any consideration to political consideration in the official action of said board, or who, knowing that such political influence has been or is attempted, does not record the same in said record shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000 or be imprisoned not to exceed 6 months, or both such fine and imprisonment, and the conviction of any member of said board of the offense herein defined shall have the effect of removing such member from office.

That is another record which the Senator in his great search of my record during the time I have been in public office failed to find.

Again on January 5, 1926, I introduced another bill relating to Muscle Shoals. Section 6 of that bill provided as follows:

SEC. 6. In the appointment of officials and the selection of employees for said corporation and in the promotion of any such employees or officials no political test or qualifications shall be permitted or given consideration, but all such appointments and promotions shall be given and made on the basis of merit and efficiency. The board shall keep a record of all requests, oral and written, made to any member thereof, coming from any source, asking for any favor in behalf of any person for the promotion of any employee, which record shall be open to public inspection. Any member of said board who permits the use of political or partisan influence in the selection of any employee, or in the promotion of any such employee of said corporation, or who gives any consideration to political consideration in the official action of said board, or who, knowing that such political influence has been or is attempted, does not record the same in said record shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000 or be imprisoned not to exceed 6 months, or both fine and imprisonment, and the conviction of any member of said board of the offense herein defined shall have the effect of removing such member from office.

That is another record which the search made by the great Senator failed to find.

On May 28, 1929, Mr. President, I introduced another bill on the subject of Muscle Shoals. In that bill, while I did not use the same language, I used the following language, speaking of the board:

(g) May appoint such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents as are necessary for the transaction of its business, fix their compensation, define generally their duties, require bonds of them and fix the penalties thereof, and dismiss at pleasure any such officer, employee, attorney, or agent, and provide a system of organization to fix responsibility and promote efficiency.

That is another record which this diligent search of my public record failed to find.

Mr. President, that is a modified form of the provision. As I said at the beginning, I did compromise on a great many things. That is one of them. That language was contained in the bill which President Hoover vetoed. I wanted to encourage Presidential approval of the bill. I knew, from my experience in connection with the bills which had passed before, some of which were reported to the Senate and debated here at great length, that there was objection to the particular provisions I had put in. I knew the probabilities were that other changes would have to be made in order to get the measure by the Senate.

That particular bill was introduced in the special session of Congress. It was passed and sent to conference in the special session. The conferees worked for weeks. The conferees failed to agree, and the special session adjourned; and the election took place between the special session and the short session of the same Congress, with the bill still in conference. One of the conferees was defeated for reelection to the House of Representatives, mainly on that issue. When we came back in the short session we finally, after a great deal of time, agreed upon a conference report and sent the bill to the President, and he vetoed it.

Mr. President, on December 9, 1931, I again introduced a joint resolution which contained the same provision I have just read. It is found on page 6. It is subsection (g). The language is just the same. I ask unanimous consent, without reading, to include in the RECORD at this point in my address subsection (g), found on page 6 of Senate Joint Resolution 15 of the Seventy-second Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

(g) May appoint such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents as are necessary for the transaction of its business, fix their compensation, define generally their duties, require bonds of them and fix the penalties thereof, and dismiss at pleasure any such officer, employee, attorney, or agent, and provide a system of organization to fix responsibility and promote efficiency.

Mr. NORRIS. Again, Mr. President, on April 12, 1933, I introduced another bill on the subject of Muscle Shoals. On page 8 of that bill, section 6, is the following language:

In the appointment of officials and the selection of employees for said Corporation, and in the promotion of any such employees or officials, no political test or qualification shall be permitted or given consideration, but all such appointments and promotions shall be given and made on the basis of merit and efficiency. Any member of said Board who is guilty of a violation of this section shall be removed from office by the President of the United States, and any appointee of said Board who is guilty of a violation of this section shall be removed from office by said Board.

That is in the law now. That, I think, is the same language that was in the bill approved by President Roosevelt. That is milder than the provision which I put in the bill two or three times when there was a Republican in the White House.

Mr. President, in some of these bills, the early ones, I put in provisions which I kept out of subsequent bills because I feared a Presidential veto or unfavorable action on the part of the Senate or the House—provisions which in substance are now in the law, which were included in the last bill I introduced, which was passed and became a law, because in a conference I had with the President himself I learned that such action would not meet with his disapproval. That language provided for the development of the great Tennessee River as a whole, not by piecemeal. It provided that this Board should so act and so develop the Tennessee Valley, so build dams, that the maximum amount of electricity should be developed at minimum cost, and that the Tennessee River should be considered as one proposition. That was the original idea I had, the original thought put in the bill, omitted from some of the bills because I feared if they ever got to the President that kind of language would be used as an argument for a Presidential veto. I was moved by a desire to have the bills enacted. Nevertheless, when these provisions were in the first bills, upon which we had very extended hearings, some of the bills being reported to the Senate favorably and some unfavorably, during all that time until the election of President Roosevelt we had in the White House a Republican President. A great deal of that time we had a Republican Senate and a Republican House.

I do not know now, in looking at the different bills, whether we had a Republican Senate or a Democratic Senate when the bills were introduced, but I introduced the same kind of a bill regardless of that fact. My heart was set on taking the Tennessee River as a whole and developing it systematically, as one great enterprise, to bring about the maximum control of navigation, of flood control, and of the development of electricity. They all hook into each other. They are all cogs in one machine; and a bill for that purpose was one of the first bills I ever introduced.

It might have been said with equal fairness, if someone wanted to criticize my attitude, that in subsequent bills I had left out the language to which I have referred; but I left that language out of several of the bills. It was omitted from the bill that President Coolidge pocket vetoed and the one that President Hoover vetoed, because I wanted to get the favor and the approval of the President of the United States.

Mr. President, that is not all. If my record is searched from a time soon after I came to the House of Representatives until the present moment, it will be found that both in Congress and out of Congress I have been an advocate of upholding the Civil Service Commission, an advocate of putting some of the great departments of the Government on a nonpartisan basis. I have always advocated it. I still believe in it. I was defeated in my attempts to do that even before I came to the Senate. I introduced a bill on the subject in the House of Representatives in January 1912. The object of the bill then introduced was to place the Post Office Department from top to bottom, with the exception of the Postmaster General, under civil-service regulations and rules—to take politics entirely out of the administration of the Post Office Department. That bill read, in part, as follows:

That on and after the 1st day of July 1912 the following positions in the Post Office Department shall be included in the competitive classified service, to wit: First Assistant Postmaster General, Second Assistant Postmaster General, Third Assistant Postmaster General, Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, and postmaster in all postoffices of the first, second, and third class; and after the said 1st day of July 1912 vacancies in any of said positions shall be filled by promotion or transfer under such rules and regulations as the Civil Service Commission shall prescribe. Such rules and regulations shall provide—

And so forth.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I voted against the proposal of the Senator, when the Home Loan measure was before us, with a great deal of reluctance. I regretted very much indeed to feel that I had to vote against it, knowing the earnestness with which the Senator from Nebraska advocated it, and his belief in it.

I want the RECORD to show that had the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska provided specifically what is provided in what he is now reading, I would have voted to reject the conference report.

I want to say, further, that I know, from what I understand the Senator's record to be, that he has tried to keep the departments of the Government out of politics.

I only wish he had succeeded in keeping them all out of politics. I am fearful that what he provided in his amendment would not have had any effect but would have been used, I am afraid, in my own State, as a cloak to hide behind and to protect many of those who were already in office down there.

I favor every one of the principles advocated by the Senator, and I was sorry to see any suggestion made which might seem to intimate that the Senator from Nebraska had not at all times undertaken to free the various departments of the Government from the iniquity of political influences which have crept into them, where they have no business to be.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for what he has said. With regard to that, permit me to say that I am not finding fault with any Senator because of his vote. The majority did not vote as I had hoped they would or as I voted, but I state again that under no conditions am I criticizing any Senator for his vote or calling in question in the remotest indefinite degree his motive in so voting. I have never done that. I realize that in this body, whatever one may think in his heart, if we are going to accomplish anything, we dare not permit one Senator openly, at least, or in the RECORD, at least, to question the motive of any other Senator. All are equal here. All, in my judgment, ought to vote according to their conscientious convictions. When they do so, before God and their country they have performed their full duty, even though I may believe they are absolutely wrong in the votes which they cast.

Mr. President, I have referred to another position I took during my public service which the search of the record made by the Senator from West Virginia did not disclose. In January 1912, when I was still in the House of Representatives, I introduced another bill, which went further than the one to which I have just referred. It would have put into the classified service not only all of the employees of the Post Office Department below the Postmaster General, but it would have put him there also. In addition to the language I have just read from the first bill I introduced in the House along this line, the next bill I introduced provided as follows:

SEC. 2. That from and after the 4th day of March 1913 appointments to the position of Postmaster General shall be for a term of 10 years, and during such term the Postmaster General shall not be subject to removal except for cause. In addition to the duties now provided by law, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to conduct the affairs of the Post Office Department upon an entirely nonpartisan basis, and in making appointments as provided in this act it shall be his duty, as far as possible, to carry out the rules and regulations promulgated by the Civil Service Commission.

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any employee of the Post Office Department to be chairman or a member of any political committee, or to have control or management of any political campaign, or for any postmaster of the first or second class, while holding such position, to engage in the active management or control of any business, trade, or profession, that in any way interferes with the full and proper performance of his official duties. Any employee violating the provisions of this section shall be removed from office.

This was another part of my record which the search failed to disclose. Let me say that there were hearings in the House of Representatives on those bills. The bills were first referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Afterward the House changed the reference, and referred them to the Committee on the Civil Service. That is as I remember it. I asked for a hearing, and was given a hearing by the latter committee. That was at a time when we had a Republican President, but as I remember it now, there was a Democratic House of Representatives, and the majority of the members of the committee at the hearing, as I remember it, were Democrats.

I got no satisfaction in the hearing from either Democrats or Republicans. I got nowhere. I did not get to first base. The political plums, the pie counter, were all the committee saw. I went away from the hearings discouraged, and feeling that there was no hope of placing the Post Office Department on a nonpartisan basis, and I have never seen the day from that time to this when I believed that we had the votes of either party to bring about that result.

I regret that, Mr. President. I think the Post Office Department ought to be one of the greatest business institutions in the United States. It is, as a matter of fact. It ought to be conducted on business principles. There is not an appointment of a postmaster anywhere in the United States, who has any official duty to perform, that should in any remote degree be a partisan matter. Postmasters transact business operations, and they ought to be selected on a business basis, and ought to hold office on a business basis. We could save many millions of dollars, in my judgment, if that could be accomplished. But that is beside the question I wanted to discuss today.

I asked one of the clerks in my office to make a search of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for anything showing my attitude on the question involved, and she got so many documents before me in the course of 2 or 3 hours time that I said, "Take them away. I cannot put them all in the RECORD without encumbering the RECORD."

I think the rank and file of Senators will realize that I have done my best, but I have failed to a large extent. However, I have still kept the faith. I still believe that I am right, even though I am in the minority, and even though, so far, I have been unable to convince either party of the righteousness of what I am speaking.

Mr. President, I believe that the people of the country are convinced. I believe that the people of the country are tired of the traffic, sometimes a disgraceful traffic, in petty patronage. I believe that Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, as I said the other day, ought to be statesmen, and not grabbers after the spoils of political victory.

A few years ago some one, I have forgotten now who it was, conceived the idea of writing a book, the title of which was to be "If I Were President." The publishers of that book selected 12 men, I think it was, each of whom was to write one chapter on that subject. In the selection of these men care was taken to select those who were not even indirectly candidates for President. The idea was to select men who had no personal interest in the subject. I was one of the 12 selected, and I wrote one chapter. I do not think the book was ever published, at least I have never seen it. I had forgotten entirely about it until a clerk in my office dug up the manuscript and showed it to me, and I now hold it in my hand.

In the chapter which I wrote I went over a great many things, all that I conceived then to be of public interest in connection with the office of President. The first part of the chapter, the very first thing I wrote, was with relation to nonpartisanship in the office of President. I am going to read just a short extract from that chapter:

If we had less partisanship in government, we would have more business in government.

That corresponds with what the mayor of Detroit said the other night over the radio, that what this country needs most is more business and less politics in government.

I said in the first part of that article:

Why should a faithful prosecuting attorney be removed from office because a new Attorney General has been installed? There is not an official duty to be performed by the President that is in any way partisan. There is no official act done by any public official but would be improved if partisanship were eliminated. If we want more business in government, why do we not apply business principles to government? What business man in the country takes politics into consideration when he employs an attorney? What citizen is injured who has his mail handled by someone of a different political faith? Where is there a single act to be performed by any public official, whether national or State, that requires partisan consideration in any degree for its performance?

It is said in opposition to this theory that we are a government of political parties, and that the distribution of public offices among adherents of a party, to the exclusion of those holding a different political faith, is necessary to keep the party organization together and supply it with the sinews of political warfare. The admission of the truth of this proposition is a virtual condemnation of political parties as they exist today. If a party has no other way of holding itself together, except a division of the loaves and fishes, it would be better for the people at large that it disintegrated. If there is no difference between parties except as to the spoils of office, then the parties have been already condemned. If a party has no principle of government upon which to stand and make battle, it is not worthy of life.

Mr. President, I ask that the first part of that article, consisting of the first three pages and a part of the fourth page, be printed in my remarks at this point without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

IF I WERE PRESIDENT

By George W. Norris

If I were President, my first official announcement would be a declaration that my administration would be entirely nonpartisan. Every appointment, from Cabinet member down, would be made without any consideration whatever of the politics of the official. The object in view would be efficiency, and qualification for the position the only consideration.

Of all the evils in Government, the greatest is partisanship. Its baneful influence is felt in every office and in every locality in the land. Where it predominates economy and efficiency disappear. It has no reason for existence in the administration of public office. Partisanship is the food on which political machines grow. It is the stock in trade of the political boss. He traffics and trades in public office as the merchant sells his goods across the counter. Inefficiency and incompetency in government is the result, and the taxpayer foots the bill. If we had less partisanship in government we would have more business in government. If partisanship were eliminated the business of the Government would be transacted on business lines. Our great Departments would become business institutions. Government in business and business in government would be almost synonymous terms. Partisanship means that public officials shall pay their personal political debts through the instrumentality of public office. Party is placed above country. An appointment to public office is a reward for party regularity. The good of all the people is sacrificed for the personal gain of a part of the people. Why should the postmastership in a distant town be changed because there has been a change in the White House? Why should a faithful prosecuting attorney be removed from office because a new Attorney General has been installed? There is not an official duty to be performed by the President that is in any way partisan. There is no official act done by any public official but what would be improved if partisanship were eliminated. If we want more business in government why do we not apply business principles to government? What business man in the country takes politics into consideration when he employs an attorney? What citizen is injured who has his mail handled by someone of a different political faith? Where is there a single act to be performed by any public official, whether national or State, that requires partisan consideration in any degree for its performance?

It is said in opposition to this theory that we are a government of political parties, and that the distribution of public offices among adherents of a party, to the exclusion of those holding a different political faith, is necessary to keep the party organization together and supply it with the sinews of political warfare. The admission of the truth of this proposition is a virtual condemnation of political parties as they exist today. If a party has no other way of holding itself together, except a division of the loaves and fishes, it would be better for the people at large that it disintegrated. If there is no difference between parties except as to the spoils of office, then the parties have been already condemned. If a party has no principle of government upon which to stand and make battle, it is not worthy of life.

If partisanship were abolished and public office given out only upon a test of qualification, it is true that machines would disappear. The expenditure of huge sums of money to get favored candidates into office would cease, and men would divide on a real division and not on an artificial one. The man who supports a candidate solely because he expects to be appointed to office on account of such support, is not entitled to office and should not get it. In a free and civilized country, the great bulk of the people want efficiency in government, the same as they do in business, and unless they get it the taxpayer must suffer and even the rights and the liberties of the people are often put in jeopardy. In a partisan government, where partisanship is rank, the sinews of war are supplied by special interests behind the scenes. They oil the machinery and get their pay in friendly legislation. They contribute to both sides and shrewdly inflame the party spirit and thus create the enthusiasm that causes many honest people to believe that they are really participating in government, when as a matter of fact, they are only choosing between two evils—deciding between two candidates, both of whom have been nominated by the same interests. This means inefficient government. This means expensive government. The people suffer and the taxpayer foots the bill. Partisanship means not only inefficient officials but it means unwise and harmful legislation as well.

George Washigton, as he retired from public office, after an experience of 8 years in the Presidency, in speaking of party spirit, used this remarkable and prophetic language:

"It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy."

It is not necessary in a free and intelligent country like ours, for the candidate for public office in order to be elected, or in order to hold the confidence of the people after he is elected, to reward party adherents with public office at the expense of efficiency and economy. An intelligent people would hail with delight, the advent of the man who would not only proclaim but who would carry out an absolute nonpartisan administration.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, of course, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] had no knowledge of that article. I do not charge them indirectly with knowing anything about that article, because it never before, so far as I know, saw the light of day. But I have, Mr. President, in public, from one end of the country to the other, advocated in political speeches and in letters and addresses to all kinds of organizations and all kinds of political parties the principles that are contained in the amendment which was rejected by the conference committee; and it seems to me that my attitude is so well known that there can be no possibility of a misunderstanding.

Mr. President, in 1914 there was organized in the city of Washington the National Popular Government League. At the meeting in this city in which that league was organized there were representatives from all over the United States. I think someone from every State in the Union was present there. I was invited to deliver an address before that organization, and I accepted. The title of my address was "A Nonpartisan Party." In the course of my remarks I quoted from the Farewell Address of George Washington, the Father of our Country; and I desire to read to the Senate at this time a quotation from that farewell address. Said George Washington:

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the State, with particular reference to the founding of them on geographical discriminations. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but, in those of the popular form, it is seen in its greatest rankness and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and sooner or later the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purposes of his own elevation, on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight), the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms, kindles the animosity of one part against another, foments occasionally riot and insurrection.

* * * * * * *

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true—and in governments of a monarchial cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose, and there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched; it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent its bursting into a flame, lest, instead of warming, it should consume.

Mr. President, I do not know how many men now remember the organization of the National Popular Government League, but I know that address went all over the United States. Afterward it was printed as a Senate document. It has long since gone out of print; but I have reason to feel, and reason to conclude, that the publicity of my attitude upon questions of nonpartisanship was almost universal. Although the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Kentucky probably did not know of it, and never heard of it—it happened quite a number of years ago, perhaps even before they were born—yet it is true that it is one of the incidents of my public life in which I stood out without regard to any particular party being in power, and advocated the same principles that I advocated when we were discussing the conference report.

I may not be right; that is not the question. I may be entirely wrong; that may be true. Nevertheless I have stood for certain things and that is one of them. From the beginning of my public life in Congress down to this moment I have to the best of my ability advocated it without regard to politics, without regard to party, and I am still a believer in it and an advocate of it. I do not want anything in the RECORD to indicate anything to the contrary.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in full that address at this stage of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

A NONPARTISAN PARTY

The very existence of the National Popular Government League is a protest against partisanship. If it were not for the evils that follow in the wake of a rank partisanship, there would be no excuse for its existence. The fundamental principles for which it stands—the measures of relief which it advocates—are all of them in their last analysis, a protest against rank partisanship. The political machine could not exist, the political boss would immediately lose his power, were it not for the false partisan loyalty that the unthinking citizen gives to the partisan leader and the partisan machine.

Let me at the outset, call your attention to the prophetic words of the Father of our Country, who from his experience and through his wisdom, saw the dangers to human liberty and to popular government through the control of governmental instrumentalities by means of partisanship. When Washington was about to lay down the burdens and the cares of government, he issued to the country and to the world, that memorable farewell address that to all lovers of human freedom, has become a classic. In speaking of political parties, he used this language: "I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the State, with particular reference to the founding of them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally. This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy. The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

"Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind (which, nevertheless, ought not to be entirely out of sight), the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it. It serves always to distract the public councils and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasional riot and insurrection. * * * There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchical cast patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And, there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming, it should consume."

I wish these words of Washington could sink deep into the heart of every American citizen, and that he would follow the principle herein announced as his guiding star.

Whenever the party spirit induces any man to support measures or to vote for men contrary to his own conscientious convictions of what is right, it is exceeding the limits of its usefulness and is retarding the progress of righteousness and humanity. Parties are only instrumentalities of government and are useful only to the extent that they improve government. Whenever the party spirit is so high or so powerful that men blindly follow it, then party government becomes detrimental to good government and the very object of its organization is perverted.

Whenever the citizenship of any party is not absolutely free to vote its convictions, then party has been placed above country and popular government retarded. The people rule only when they are uncontrolled by the biased prejudice of partisanship. They are free only when they are uncoerced and men are political slaves when through the spirit of partisanship, they perform governmental functions under restraint and coercion. Even though we are moved only by a desire to keep our party right, we can perform no higher function than to condemn it or to vote against it whenever we believe it is wrong. It is the duty of every patriotic citizen to condemn wrong or evil in his own party just as quickly and with the same severity, as though he discovered it in some other party, and he ought to be just as anxious to uncover the wrong in his own party as he is to expose it in any other party. Public officials should get out from under the erroneous impression and the wrong belief that has sometimes heretofore existed, that in their official capacity they are serving a party. When the official or the citizen is serving his country best, if he is not then serving his party best, it logically follows that there is something wrong with his party. "Vote your ticket straight, regardless of everything else", is the slogan of the political boss and the manager of the partisan machine. But the modern progressive citizen answers it by saying: "Scratch your ticket freely and on all occasions when in your own heart you believe that the popular will will be promoted thereby." Partisanship in the past has been so rank that it has often meant political suicide to advocate the scratching of the ticket. And yet, I believe that every thinking, honest, patriotic citizen will agree with me when I say that the salvation of the country, the perpetuity of our institutions and the advancement and progress of civilization and humanity depend on the independent voter.

It is well for us to consider some of the inconsistencies of our partisan control. We have been making some rapid strides toward independence within the last decade. It has not been many years ago since every appointive office within the gift of the national administration has been decided entirely upon the ground of partisanship. Our forefathers who framed the Constitution never intended that such should be the case and it was a great many years before the machine and the boss had developed the science of partisan politics to such an extent that the people discovered that to hold an office the one supreme qualification of the applicant was his partisanship.

For years the fight has been going on to take political offices out from under the control of the political machine. The Civil Service Law now on our statute books is a result of such agitation. Many thousands of positions have been placed upon a merit basis rather than a partisan basis, and no man has ever yet claimed that in any instance the service has not been improved by such change. Let us take the Post Office Department as an illustration, and I take it only as an illustration. A few years ago every official in it, from the janitor and the clerk in the remotest and most insignificant office up to the Postmaster General himself, were all appointed on a partisan basis. Every man who distributed mail upon the thousands of cars that go with lightning speed across the country obtained his position not from merit but because of the favor of some partisan leader. Most of these officials have been removed from politics, and who has ever heard of anyone making the claim that the service was not improved thereby? Every step of this progress has been bitterly fought by the partisan. Every political machine and every political boss has steadfastly stood in the way of every step of progress that we have made. The country has done well, but the battle is only commenced. Why, for instance, should the postmaster in a little town on the western plains be changed every time there is a change in the occupant of the White House? Or even worse than that, why should he be changed even when a different faction of some party gains control in such party? What official act has the postmaster to do that is involved in any partisan political question that has ever been fought out before the American people? If the people of any place are getting good service in the post office and are satisfied with the administration of the local office, why should all this be changed simply because a different administration is in power in Washington? The new postmaster, who may be an excellent man, but who has perhaps never seen the inside of a post office, takes control not because of any superior qualifications for the office that he possesses but because he agrees with the party in power on the tariff or on some other question of national import.

We have placed under the civil service thousands of clerks and post-office officials, but they are all in the lower ranks. The captains and the generals are still put in and put out according to the unreasonable and unjust commands of partisanship. The new man who goes in has to learn the duties of his office from the inferior official who remains in and who is beyond the control of partisanship. When he learns his duties, if he ever does, and becomes efficient, there has been, perhaps, another change in the national administration and the poor clerk has another educational campaign on his hands to instruct some new official in his official duties. There is not a single official duty to be performed by any man in the Post Office Department, from the Postmaster General down to the postmaster at the country crossroads, that is in any way, either directly or indirectly, connected with partisanship. The duties which they have to perform are defined by law, and no man can tell from an investigation of their official duties to what political party they give allegiance. This great Department can be likened to an enormous business institution. It comes in contact with all the people. Its official duties are clearly defined. Every business man depends upon its efficiency. Every society or organization—religious, educational, and even political—depends upon it in the transaction of its business. It ought to be a great business institution, absolutely divorced from politics, absolutely independent of partisanship, thus giving its army of employees an opportunity to give the best there is in them toward the development and improvement of the service. It can never reach the zenith of its usefulness and can never fully perform the functions it is intended to perform, and that it is provided by law it should perform, until it is taken out from under the domain of partisanship. We have improved it by putting the privates on a merit basis, but we still leave the captains and the generals to be bargained for and sold to the highest bidder on the partisan political pie counter.

The Government is entitled to the best service that every one of its officials can possibly perform. How can we get this service out of public servants if they are compelled to use their official positions for partisan purposes? How can we expect them to develop and improve the service when they know that their tenure of office does not depend upon their efficiency but upon the party spirit that controls and permeates the entire institution? How long could a great railroad corporation, for instance, remain out of the hands of a receiver if it provided that all its important positions should be filled for partisan reasons and not on account of efficiency? How many of us would want to ride on trains, if we knew that while perhaps the brakeman and the fireman were appointed because they understood their business, but yet the conductor and the engineer, who had charge of the train, were placed in control not on account of their knowledge of railroading but solely because they agreed on the tariff with the millionaire who owned the road?

What I have said about the Post Office Department applies with equal force, with perhaps one possible exception, to every other department of our National Government. It will also apply to nearly all positions, both State and National, in our entire country. Did it ever occur to you that 99 percent of the official action of every official from the President down to road supervisor, is in its very nature, nonpartisan? Who would want to take partisanship into our schools? Who would advocate the selection of teachers for partisan reasons? And yet, do we not elect county superintendents, State superintendents, and appoint officials in the educational bureaus, both State and National, mainly because of partisan reasons? Again we have permitted the privates to be selected because of their merit, but we have placed over them officials to control and outline their work, merely because these higher officials have a certain partisanship.

So I might go on through practically every department of Government and without exception, we would always find that those in higher authority are there on account of partisanship.

If government is to be administered for the benefit of all the people, and if we are anxious to attain the highest science and the highest degree of efficiency in government, then, as advised by the immortal Washington, we ought to restrain this party spirit. Partisanship has blinded and deceived the patriotic citizen, and the cry of party loyalty has misled the honest public servant. Unreasonable partisanship is the stepping stone by which the party boss climbs to his throne of power, from which he rules the destinies of political parties and controls the policies of a nation. The party boss is the political merchant. He deals and trades in offices, in measures, and in men as the merchant deals and traffics in merchandise across the counter. The circulating medium of his business is political patronage. It is the legal tender of payment for official favors and for special legislation. To him party solidarity is necessary for success, and obedience to decrees of self-constituted party leaders is paid for in the coin of his realm. His existence is detrimental to good government; it retards advancement, prevents improvement, and keeps the people out of control of their own Government. His business is expensive, but the deceived and misguided partisan citizen who has given him his power not only loses the benefits of good economical government, but he foots the entire bill of these evil methods when he pays his taxes. Without the spirit of rank partisanship, the power of the boss would fade away, his throne would crumble, and his machine would disappear. I am not denouncing party—I am not proclaiming against organization. Under present conditions parties are perhaps necessary, and organization is not only desirable but is absolutely essential. But when party or organization goes to the extent of coercion, then they have passed their usefulness, and, in the prophetic words of Washington, they have become a fire that instead of warming is consuming.

As contradictory as it may seem, the country needs a nonpartisan party that shall advocate freedom of thought; freedom of action, both in the citizen and in the public official; a public sentiment that shall demand of every citizen and of every official a service of country rather than of party; a sentiment that shall applaud rather than condemn any citizen who shall scratch his ticket and any public official who shall oppose his party whenever in his own heart he believes such action best for good government and the advancement of humanity and civilization.

I am aware that this sentiment will be regarded as party treason by political bosses and party leaders, and even honest, patriotic citizens who have long lived in a party rut and followed faithfully and without thinking, the party banner, will look with disfavor upon much that I have said, but I am firm in the conviction that the man who thinks and the man who is moved in his thought only in a desire for the betterment and the advancement of the people generally, must ultimately and inevitably reach the conclusion that in the highest type of government, in the ultimate happiness of all the people, such sentiments as I have expressed must and will eventually prevail.

If those who believe otherwise are right; if to scratch a ticket or to bolt a party is party treason; if to criticize a party policy or refuse to follow the commands of a party leader is a party crime; if it is the duty of every member of a party to always vote his ticket straight; if to criticize a party policy or refuse to follow a party leader is unpatriotic, then our official ballot should not contain the name of any candidate. It would only be necessary to print the party names. This would bring us to a realization of the short ballot with a suddenness and a vengeance that would be surprising even if not demoralizing.

A nonpartisan administration of government, both in nation and in State, where every official without coercion, without fear of party punishment, would do his duty and perform every official act according to the dictates of his own conscience, would restore the government into the hands of the people and bring to us and our posterity the blessings of a real democracy. When partisanship controls and party loyalty is the supreme test of good standing, then party is placed above country and the rights of the people are surrendered to the control of the boss. We need public officials who do not regard public office so highly and do not love official life so dearly that they are willing to surrender their judgment to the dictates of party regularity, or sacrifice their consciences to the control of party leaders. We need an intelligent patriotic citizenship that shall defend such public servants in the performance of their official duties. I would rather suffer political death and be free, than to live forever in official luxury and be a political slave.

Every idea that I have advocated is in direct accord with the principles upon which the National Popular Government League is established. The measures for which this league stands would have been enacted years ago, had it not been for the rank partisanship that controls all political parties under our present system. The Gateway amendment, providing for an easier method of amending the Federal Constitution, Presidential primaries, the abolition of the electoral college, the initiative, the referendum, the recall, and effective corrupt practices acts, all will be enacted into law and become operative just as soon as we can abolish machines, partisan bosses, and free the citizens from the evil and vicious influence of partisanship. Through these measures the people will eventually get control of the entire machinery of government, and these measures will all be enacted as soon as they can receive consideration at the hands of a patriotic people, uncoerced by the blighting influences of partisanship.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a long article containing 39 pages, most of which was published, but it is only a reiteration of what I have said here and what I have said elsewhere. I am not going to do more than call attention to it in passing.

I have here also a magazine article which I wrote a few years ago, since I came to the Senate. It was published and had quite a wide circulation, I thought. I want to read an extract from that article. I have an idea that I have a right to believe that more or less of the people of the country read it and were acquainted with my attitude. It is the same thing over again. If I printed it, it would be only a repetition of what I have said, though in different language, in the address which I have just had printed in the RECORD. But I want to read this extract:

Where is there an official act of the Department of Justice that is in any way connected with partisanship? The Attorney General, the judges, the prosecuting attorneys, the marshals, and the deputies, all have official duties in no way and in no sense partisan, and yet every one of them is put into office on account of partisanship. It does not follow, of course, that we always get bad men, but it does follow, when such an illogical system is in vogue, that we necessarily get incompetent men who use their offices for the purpose of controlling votes, for the purpose of keeping the machine to which the officeholder belongs, in control, however incompetent and corrupt. Efficiency and economy are secondary considerations.

Further on in that article I said:

Partisanship blinds the reason of honest men. It causes men who are honest and patriotic to violate every principle of business and of justice, and they do this at a time when the welfare of all the people is at stake. They would not honestly in business, in church, or in social matters, but when it comes to politics they disregard all such considerations, and follow blindly and without reason the command and dictates of a party boss.

Mr. President, it was during the Sixty-fourth Congress, while I was still a Member of the House of Representatives, that I was invited to deliver an address in the city of Philadelphia before the Thirty-fourth Annual Meeting of the National Civil Service League. I have in my hand a copy of that address. I said there at that time as a part of that address:

And so we go on from one administration to another, from one faction in a party to another faction in the same party, dealing out these positions as though they were the personal property of whatever political machine happened to be in control. Why should not this great Department be operated upon a business basis? What corporation could do business in a similar way and be kept out of the hands of a receiver?

Further on I said:

Our Post Office Department ought to be the most proficient and scientifically operated corporation in the world. It will become such if we eliminate politics and provide for appointment and promotion of the various officials in the Department on account of proficiency and demonstrated ability.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print at this point in my remarks the address to which I have just referred.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE APPLICATION OF THE MERIT SYSTEM TO POST OFFICES OF THE PRESIDENTIAL CLASS

By Senator George W. Norris, of Nebraska

The subject assigned me for discussion is "The application of the merit system to post offices of the Presidential class." There is no argument in favor of putting postmasters into the classified service that does not apply with equal force to all other positions in the entire Post Office Department. This is only another way of expressing the idea that the Post Office Department should be taken out of politics. It may be said in passing that no argument can be made in favor of taking the Post Office Department out of politics that does not apply with equal force to practically every department of Government. It applies also to every State, county, and municipal government in the United States. I prefer, therefore, to discuss the question upon the broader phase—the application of the merit system to the entire Post Office Department, or, to put it in a still broader sense, I am in reality discussing the question of eliminating partisanship from governmental affairs, and am using the Post Office Department only as an illustration. Partisanship has always been recognized as one of the great evils of government. The framers of our Constitution never intended that partisanship should gain the enormous power that it has attained in modern times. It has always been recognized as an evil, and its injurious and demoralizing effects are pointed out by Washington in his farewell address. Its baneful and injurious effects are felt wherever it exists. It is an enemy to efficiency, economy, and honesty. Its withering influence contaminates everything with which it comes in contact. Political parties ought to be only instrumentalities of government, rather than government an instrumentality of party. Partisanship is the cohesive force that keeps together every political machine on earth. It is the food on which political bosses feast and grow fat. It is always nourished and kept alive by political patronage or money, but usually by both. The political boss deals in patronage like the merchant handles his wares over the counter. He sells offices and the recipients must give value received, either in political work, official favors, or in cash, through political contributions. He is not interested in efficiency, economy, or honesty in government. He is only interested in party control and in party distribution of patronage. He considers the welfare of the people as secondary to party solidarity, party control, and party favor. Through the instrumentality of patronage he controls legislatures, Congresses, Governors, and even courts and Presidents. Every public official, regardless of what position he occupies, ought to cease to be a partisan the moment he goes into public office. In every official act that he performs and in every official appointment that he makes he ought to be guided only by the good of the service and not be influenced by the control of the party.

There is no place in official life, from the President in the White House down to the school moderator in the country, where any official act or any official appointment ought to be influenced or controlled by partisanship. Our country would hail with delight any proclamation from the White House that the President of the United States had decided that in all of the various departments of our Federal Government partisanship should have nothing to do with appointment to office and that no official action of any Federal officeholder should be controlled or influenced by party considerations, but that every appointment to office and every promotion in office and every official act by any officeholder should have for its sole object honest efficiency. It has been the aim of honest, progressive citizens the country over for many years to take various positions of Government out from under the control of partisanship. This idea was the origin of the civil service law. Much has been accomplished in this line and yet but small headway has been made. Unimportant and insignificant positions—those of small salary—have been placed under civil service, but the important positions, where the responsibility is great and the salary large, are still subject for traffic and sale across the political pie counter. The object of the civil service is to improve government, and it is a remarkable fact that there has never been an instance where a political position has been placed in the classified service that the same has ever been put back under political control by the people themselves. And there has never been an instance where positions have been thus classified but what improvement in government has resulted.

The Post Office Department of our Government does business and comes in contact with more people than any other department of this or any other government in the civilized world. We are daily dependent upon it for the success of our business enterprises, for the education of our children, and for the happiness and comfort of all our people. If its operations should be suspended for 1 day, we would be completely lost in a maze of bewilderment. It does not cease its work and its operation when nightfall empties the counting house, closes the business office, empties our schools, and drives the busy life from off our crowded streets; but while we are slumbering in peace, recruiting and renewing our strength for a new day, its employees and faithful servants are toiling during the weary hours of the night in the performance of their various duties, separating, on busy pounding railways and in countless post offices, the millions of missives, messages, and documents that shall on the coming morning be promptly placed in the waiting hands of millions of our citizens. In all this great Department, from the faithful rural carrier who delivers mail to the ranchman far out on the western plains to the Postmaster General who sits in his luxurious office in our Nation's Capital, there is not a single, solitary duty to be performed by any of its countless employees and officials that is either directly or indirectly of a partisan, political nature. Altogether they constitute a great army working with ceaseless vigor for the success and happiness of all the people, regardless of creed, religion, or politics. There is nothing equal to it in all the civilized world. The work of this great Department could not be performed with any degree of efficiency if a very large number of its 300,000 employees were not already classified under the civil service, and it is because a large majority of these public servants are thus classified that its present efficiency is kept up. And yet the honest citizen must be shocked when he realizes that this classification applies only to the inferior position. The men and women who do the actual work but who draw the smallest salaries—in reality the privates—are all under the civil service.

The important positions—those in which the higher salaries are paid, the major generals, the colonels, the captains, and the lieutenants in this vast Army—have been appointed and hold their positions because of political activities in behalf of some political party or some faction of some political party, or some particular public official. They are subject to removal and are as a rule removed whenever there has been a change in one office, the Presidency. (If we would at one stroke remove from office all of the persons in the Post Office Department who are now under civil service, the Department would collapse; it could not perform its various functions. On the other hand, if all of the political officeholders in the Department were at once removed and no one kept but the civil-service employees, the Department could go on almost indefinitely in the regular routine of its business.) I have in mind a first-class post office in the capital of one of our States, where a new postmaster was appointed and before he had learned even the routine duties of his office he died. The place remained vacant for several months and then another postmaster was appointed, and before the faithful classified servants of the office had taught him his duties, he also died. The office then again remained vacant for quite a long time, when the third postmaster was appointed. In reality, there was a vacancy in this office for over a year. In fact, it was worse than a vacancy, because it was necessary when these various appointees went into office, for classified officials in the office to spend a good portion of their time in teaching them their new duties. And yet, during all the time of this vacancy, the patrons of the office could not have told from the management of the office itself that there was any vacancy in the postmastership. The records of the Department at Washington will likewise show that all the work of the postmaster had been carefully and properly attended to by appointees in the office under the classified service. Can anyone give a reason why the postmaster at Philadelphia, for instance, should be dismissed and a new man employed to take charge of that great office simply because there has been a change in the Presidency of the United States? What official connection does the postmaster at Philadelphia or any other city have with the Presidency? There are nearly 8,000 Presidential offices in the United States, and almost without exception these men have all been selected not because of any knowledge they possessed of the duties pertaining to the office or their understanding of the various workings of the Post Office Department, but because of their political activity and influence in their respective communities in behalf of some political party or some political candidate. Why are these offices made the personal property of political officials? As long as this method prevails the Post Office Department must of necessity be a great political machine. Ability to perform the duties of the office are desired, but such proficiency is a secondary consideration. The first and controlling reason is one of pure partisanship. The office is given to the man who has done faithful political service and who it is believed will be able to do the best political work for some party or official in the future. But after the postmaster has served several years and has been duly instructed by the faithful classified clerks, and has reached a reasonable proficiency in office, there has perhaps been a change in the political control at Washington, or what will have the same effect, a different faction in his own political party has gained ascendency and he must be removed and another man put in his place, who is equally without any particular qualification for the office, and again, the faithful assistant postmaster will have a new student to take instruction as to his public duties.

And so we go from one administration to another, from one faction in a party to another faction in the same party, dealing out these positions as though they were the personal property of whatever political machine happened to be in control. Why should not this great Department be operated upon a business basis? What corporation could do business in a similar way and be kept out of the hands of a receiver? Let us compare it, for a moment, with the great Pennsylvania Railway system. When the president or other controlling official of that great corporation finds an agent in some little country town who shows some particular ability beyond the scope of that required at his particular station, he promotes him and gives him a better position at an increased salary, and his promotion and his salary increase depend entirely upon the proficiency which he shows in the various positions he holds. Men are presidents of great railroad corporations who formerly worked on the section, and it is a well-known fact that such men make the best managers of such great institutions, because they know every detail of every position from the bottom to the top. Our Post Office Department ought to be the most proficient and scientifically operated corporation in the world. It will become such if we eliminate politics and provide for appointment and promotion of the various officials in the Department on account of proficiency and demonstrated ability.

The practical question at once presents itself: How can we bring about this much-desired improvement in the Department? What law must be passed in order to take the Post Office Department entirely out of politics and place it in the merit system? Technically speaking, we cannot put the Postmaster General into the civil service. He is the head of a department, and the Constitution provides that the heads of departments are to be appointed by the President, and we can not take this appointing power away except by an amendment to the Constitution; but the Constitution also provides that the President shall appoint the members of the Supreme Court, and yet the Supreme Court is entirely removed from political domination. Why could we not apply the same principle to the Postmaster General and take him, also, out of the realm of politics? It would be a very easy matter to provide by law for the appointment of the Postmaster General for a long term of years, or even during good behavior, and thus place him as far beyond politics and political control as are members of the Supreme Court. Then it could be provided by law that all other appointments in the Department should be made by the Postmaster General, and that he should make such appointments from lists made up by the Civil Service Commission, the same as all other classified appointments are made. It would be very easy to state in the law itself that it was the intention of the lawmakers, and that it should be the duty of the Postmaster General, to place the Department entirely upon a civil-service basis. The law should also provide for the transfer of officials from one branch of the Department to another, and for the promotion under civil-service rules from one post office to another. If these simple changes were made in the law the Post Office Department would at once become a nonpartisan institution, a great governmental corporation, organized upon scientific lines, performing a purely nonpartisan service for all of the people.

I am not finding fault with any of our postmasters. It is the system by which they are appointed and removed that is to blame. Every postmaster knows that he will lose his position just as soon as his party loses control of the Presidency, or what is equally uncertain, just as soon as his faction in his own political party loses its control of that party.

With this uncertain tenure a postmaster cannot be expected to give his best efforts to the Department. He must hold on to his business or profession, because he knows it will probably not be long until he will be put out of office and again be dependent upon his own efforts for a livelihood. The result is that while he performs his official duty his mind is upon his private business; while he is working with his hands for the Government his mind and brain are following private lines of business. That he should neglect his official duties under such circumstances is not only probable but perfectly natural. The Government pays him a salary sufficient to receive all his time and all his ability. If he shows exceptional proficiency, it ought to be possible to promote him in the Service; and yet he knows that this is impossible, and the result is he does not and cannot be expected to devote his mind and his energy to the improvement of the system or even to the increasing of its present proficiency. This is not true of any business concern in the civilized world. From the very nature of things the postmaster is a politician. It is probably because he was a politician that he secured the office, and since his very official existence depends upon politics, he continues to be a politician. It would be wrong, as long as present conditions exist, to expect him to do otherwise. If our Post Office Department were placed in the civil service, and the few changes I have suggested were made in the law, it would be possible for a rural carrier away out on the western plains or a postmaster in a country town or a railway-mail clerk to advance step by step and eventually, on account of his own demonstrated ability, become postmaster of one of our great cities or one of the Assistant Postmaster Generals in the Department at Washington. If this were possible, the Post Office Department would take on new life. Its proficiency and improvement would be continually on the increase. Every employee would be moved by a laudable and honest ambition to improve his own condition and increase his own salary, which he could only do by increasing the proficiency of the Department itself. Men and women, instead of going into the Department for temporary purposes, would enter it as a life profession. Postmasters, instead of devoting their time and attention to their private affairs, would devote all of their ability and all of their energies to their official duties, and the results would certainly appear in the betterment and the increased proficiency of the entire Department. It would become a profession where ability and competency would be displayed for the improvement and the economical administration of the burdens.

The adjustment of the Post Office Department along the line I have outlined would bring about many economies. In the first place, it would be possible to reduce the salaries of some of the larger post offices. Postmasters holding such positions would gladly welcome such a reduction, if the tenure of office were made dependent upon faithful service, and if upon such faithful service they would be entitled to promotion and were relieved from political contributions. From a careful investigation that I have made, I am confident that a million dollars annually could be saved in this item alone. But the greatest improvement would be in efficiency of service and economy of management. Every employee of the Department would at once become an earnest and enthusiastic instrumentality for the improvement and development of the service. He would not only be working with his hands, but he would be working with his brain. The Department would get the benefit of his thought as well as his physical labor. Improved methods and better service would naturally be developed everywhere. One-cent postage would come as a natural result of the many improvements and economies that would be brought about. The Department would, in addition to this, be self-sustaining.

No man can foretell the extent of improvement and development that would be brought about, but that it would be great and far-reaching there can be no possibility of doubt.

But greater and above all would come the lesson that such a system would teach to the country. The merit system applied to the Post Office Department would be a beacon light that would soon educate the public sentiment of the country to a point where it would be demanded that the same system should be applied to all other departments of Government. The beneficial effects of the system would extend into States, counties, and municipalities. The traffic and trading by the political boss in public office would cease; proficiency in public service would become the watchword, and there would be no end to the reform until the thought was thoroughly emblazoned in every patriotic heart, that public service should be, and must become a public trust, and that the retention of official position must depend upon honesty and proficiency.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator would not find that in the records probably, but it is a part of the public history of the United States. I happen to know—and I would not mention it if it were not partially as a matter of self-defense—that the address attracted the attention of the Post Office Department of the Government of Cuba. I had an official communication from the official there who corresponds to our Postmaster General, who was attempting to reorganize that department in Cuba, asking for copies of the address. Copies of the address have been sent to all parts of the United States. Those who believe, as I do, that the Post Office Department ought to be on a nonpartisan business basis have by the thousands read that address. I assume that even Members of the Senate might sometimes have read it or read comments upon it.

Mr. President, I have received today an editorial from the St. Louis Post Dispatch commenting upon the debate in the Senate the other day. I ask unanimous consent to print it in the RECORD at this point in my remarks, because it has a tendency to show and does show and say that this is a fight in which I have been engaged from the very beginning of my public service. It says that truthfully. I ask unanimous consent to print the editorial at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post Dispatch, Apr. 27, 1934]

THESE DEMOCRATIC SPOILSMEN

Senator NORRIS tried to make statesmen out of the pie-counter politicians on the Democratic side of the Chamber. He failed. He was asking them to support his amendment to the bill guaranteeing the home-loan bonds. The amendment's purpose was to purge the Home Owners' Loan Corporation of politics.

That was too much for the Democrats, even though the President had pointedly approved the Norris proposal, going so far even as to suggest that politics ought to be barred from all the Federal relief agencies. All but five of the Democratic Senators went on record as spoilsmen, unafraid, and hungry. The five who subordinated party were Senators LOGAN, of Kentucky; THOMPSON, of Nebraska; POPE, of Idaho; MCCARRAN, of Nevada; and THOMAS, of Utah.

The Nebraskan spoke feelingly. He called the Democrats "job hunters." Their action, he said, "comes mighty near condemning Roosevelt." He warned them of the political consequences, predicting their vote might defeat Mr. Roosevelt for reelection, were the contest close. He might as well have talked to so many sea gulls.

From the Democratic side, NEELY, of West Virginia, attempted a defense. His wit was heavy-footed. His political reasoning was dull. He cited the fact that the present administration is in power by the greatest majority in the history of the Republic. He evidently forgot the fact that the administration immediately preceding this one was also seated by a verdict that cracked the "solid South." Yet it was repudiated. Why? For many reasons, of course, but among them don't forget the passage of the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act—in violation of the party's platform pledge; in flagrant defiance of public sentiment, expert economic protest, and the remonstrance of the party press.

Senator NEELY and his fellow spoilsmen, too, have forgotten another warning that was issued on the floor of the Senate. Again a Republican was speaking. He was addressing his Republican colleagues, many of whom had made a point of retiring to the cloakrooms as a gesture of disrespect. It did not perturb or embarrass old fighting Bob La Follette, who assured the absentees that most of them would vacate their seats permanently after the next election. They did.

So may these Democratic partisans, who think relief agencies should be manned by Democrats; who are voting to spend the people's money to provide jobs for Democrats; who in these difficult times, which challenge the very best in all of us, and especially those in high places, cannot rise above the dead level of greedy partisan politics.

Fortunately, we have always had some men in public life who were better than their party. NORRIS, of Nebraska, has been better than his party, oftener and more conspicuously and courageously so, we believe, than any other official. Mr. Roosevelt is better than his party in urging the adjournment of partisanship. The Republican Party has been brought to its present destitution by reactionaries who could neither see so clearly nor think so honestly as Senator NORRIS. Perhaps the reactionary Democrats, incapable of following Roosevelt's nonpartisan lead, will do the same thing to the Democratic Party.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it has been embarrassing for me to take up this matter, because I have been talking entirely about myself and about my own record. I should not have done it under any circumstances if this question were not near and dear to my heart; if I had not believed that the record as it was made the other day by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], without their intending to do me any harm, had left me in a false attitude. I should not have cared for that if I had thought I was going to be here as long as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will be here. While, for a great many purposes, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is a burial ground, I realize that the RECORD is going to live long after I am gone. I do not expect to be here long. I cannot, from the very nature of things, expect such a thing; but as I go out I want my record to be right.

I have sacrificed more than any Senator knows for the record I have made. Wrong it may be. However wrong and bad it may be, I have made sacrifices that perhaps no one else here has; and when I was charged, as I was the other day on the floor of the Senate, with trying to bolster up my party and embarrass the other party when it was in power, I felt that I could not let such an imputation stand without contradicting it. I want the RECORD to show what the truth is. I want my countrymen to know that I have been true to the faith, whether it is right or wrong; that I have never deviated from the straight and narrow path I have advocated for years.

Mr. President, to a great extent I have been an outcast in my own party because of my advocacy of these principles. Many times I have been fought desperately by the leaders of my own party, when my political life was at stake, because I had dared to be what they called irregular. I have been criticized, I think, honestly, by those who believed that a man ought always to obey his party dictates. When I was a Member of the House of Representatives I was one of those who helped to bring about the abolition of the secret caucus of parties over there. I denounced them publicly. I denounced them on the floor of the House. My remarks are in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I have addressed audiences all over the United States on the subject of the fight there about secret caucuses.

I have tried my best to secure the enactment of some of these reforms, and have almost always signally failed. That does not mean that I am wrong. I still believe that the honest, patriotic citizen who believes as I do about these matters is in the majority; and I believe, as I said in one of these addresses, if Senators will do me the honor to read it, that on of the things we ought to have is a party that will say, "When we are administering office, when we are dealing out positions for those who conduct business transactions, we will have the appointments made on business and nonpartisan principles." I believe such a party can go before the people with that kind of a defense for its action and be successful against any political machine that human ingenuity has ever put together.

In connection with some of these bills during the time my party was in power I fought against all kinds of obstacles. As I said, I have been denounced. I remember that when one of my colleagues here was talking with President Coolidge about me in some way—they were talking about patronage and they drifted to me—President Coolidge said to him, "The trouble with Senator NORRIS is that he will not cooperate."

President Coolidge told the truth. I do not believe in the kind of cooperation that he meant. You all know what he meant and anybody who has had any experience with Congress knows what he meant. We can cover it up and laugh it off as we please, but it is true nevertheless. We ought not to "kid" ourselves about it. We ought not to "kid" ourselves that the country does not understand it.

They know all about it; and I think—although again I may be wrong—that the great majority of the American people are disgusted and tired and sick of the way one political party promises to do better than the other, and when it gets into office it does the same old thing over again, and when its members are criticized for it they say, "Why, our predecessors, the other party, did that, and we are no worse than they were."

I should like to see the time when we would have a President of the United States who would issue an order, for instance, at the beginning of his administration, which would say, "From henceforth the Post Office Department under my administration is going to be nonpartisan. It is going to be a business institution. We are going to conduct it on business principles." I think the people of the country would say "amen" to such an announcement.

Of all the Presidents who have been in the White House since I have been here, I believe the one who comes nearest to believing in that kind of a doctrine is the man who is there now. He stood out for this amendment against his own party and said it was right. He asked that it be enacted into law, and his own party in the House and in the Senate would not do it. I do not criticize them. If they thought it ought not to be put in the law, it was their duty to keep it out; but I say that I think President Roosevelt comes nearer to trying to conduct the business of the Government on business principles than any other President who has been in the White House since I have been in Congress. I want to help him. I want to help him in that line even if I disagree with him on some others. If we could do that one thing, while it is not enough, while we ought to do other things, I think it would go further than any other one reform to put this Government back into a condition of prosperity, to enable it to conduct its business on a business basis, and give to the people of the country an administration of its laws that would be more satisfactory than any which has come before.

Mr. President, I am not finding fault with the men who criticize me. That is not what I am trying to defend myself against. I am not finding fault because the political machine ran over me. It has run over me so often in the past 30 years that it does not hurt any more to have it run over me. I am used to it. It is almost a daily occurrence, or was until the present President came into office. That is not what I am complaining about. Let no one get the idea, either, that I am "sore", or that I feel harsh toward Members of the Senate who have not voted as I would vote. I am sorry. I believe the time will come when their descendants will realize that I am right. I want my record kept straight. On some things I would not care so much; but here is a fundamental cornerstone of my political philosophy, and I want to defend it here, elsewhere, now, and evermore, until I am convinced that I am wrong. I think more of it than I do of any other one thing in the Government.

I have often been laughed at. I have been abused. I have been practically driven out of one party, with no place to go, as it might be said; but I have still tried to keep that faith. I am going to keep it. Senators can criticize my record; they can say that I am wrong, and I will not feel hard nor hurt. That is their privilege; but they cannot with my consent place in the RECORD anything which will put me in a false light on a fundamental principle which I believe to be one of the most important in the Government. I think they are wrong; but I believe also that the words of the Savior as He was nailed to the cross are applicable to the circumstances here, and I use His words:

Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, in order that the record may be kept perfectly straight, and that all who run may correctly read and determine whether I have spoken unfairly or ungraciously of the able Senator from Nebraska in the debate to which he has referred, I invite attention to page 4818 of the RECORD for the 19th day of March, where the following appears as a part of my remarks on the Norris amendment:

Let me very explicitly and emphatically assert that I believe the Senator from Nebraska is actuated by the purest of motives and the most patriotic of desires in urging the adoption of his amendment. But, unhappily the Republican reactionaries who are so enthusiastically, gallantly, and unanimously following the leadership of the great Nebraska progressive on this occasion know that to make the Home Owners' Loan Corporation nonpartisan will be to make it eventually solidly Republican, in spite of the intentions of the Senator from Nebraska to the contrary.

Later in the same address I said:

Let me pay my sincere compliments to the great Senator from Nebraska and measure my words when I say that in my opinion, excepting George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and Abraham Lincoln, the United States Government owes him more than it owes any other American citizen, living or dead.

That is my estimate of the Honorable GEORGE W. NORRIS, the greatest progressive since the Crucifixion.

In the speech of which the Senator complains I did not say that he had not been nonpartisan, not that he had not advocated nonpartisanship under Republican administrations. What I did say was as follows:

I have searched the RECORD and had it searched for the full period that the Senator has served in this body in a vain effort to find where the Senator from Nebraska under a Republican administration ever attempted as vigorously as he is attempting now to have a great governmental department made nonpartisan.

Mr. President, by that statement I still stand. I still believe it to be justified. If anyone will produce an address delivered by the Senator from Nebraska in which he, under a Republican administration, spoke as vigorously in favor of nonpartisanism in government as he spoke in support of the Norris amendment and in favor of the rejection of the conference report last week I shall publicly apologize to him and to the Senate for what I have said.

No one can go before me in believing that there is not a more sincere or worthy statesman than Senator NORRIS on this planet. I was unhappily compelled to believe that the adoption of his amendment would prove injurious, both to the public and the political party now in power. In the circumstances I spoke and voted against it, according to the dictates of my conscience and my judgment.

The Senator's public service is one of the great treasures of the Republic. His record shines with the brilliancy of the morning star. I rejoice in believing that it will be the inspiration of millions of American patriots a thousand years after all of us shall have passed away.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR URGENT NEEDS IN PUBLIC SERVICES

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has moved and secured a reconsideration of the votes whereby House Joint Resolution 332 was read the third time and passed. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution may be laid before the Senate at this time for the purpose of offering an amendment to it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not recall the incident to which the Senator refers. Will he not make a statement as to the purpose he has in mind?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, Mr. President.

The joint resolution provided that a fund of $35,000 be appropriated for the use of certain investigating committees of the House. It also provided for three other appropriations. The Senate, in the legislative appropriation bill, appropriated $150,000 to be used by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. That bill has not as yet become a law, and probably will not for some time. The Committee on Banking and Currency owes a considerable sum for expenses, and it is very necessary to have the contingent fund replenished.

Mr. McNARY. Is it the intention to replenish the contingent fund of the Senate?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is all that is provided.

Mr. McNARY. Then I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H.J.Res. 332) to provide appropriations to meet urgent needs in certain public services, and for other purposes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, after line 6, it is proposed to insert the following:

SENATE

For expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers of committees at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, fiscal year 1934, $150,000: Provided, That except in the case of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation no part of this appropriation shall be expended for services, personal, professional, or otherwise, in excess of the rate of $3,600 per annum: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for per diem and subsistence expenses except in accordance with the provisions of the Subsistence Expense Act of 1926, approved June 3, 1926, as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time. The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

MUNICIPAL DEBT READJUSTMENT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5950) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask whether it is the intention that a final vote be taken on the bill tonight.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is not.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to discuss the bill for a few minutes. It will not take me long, I can finish in 5 minutes, and I will proceed if we are to get a vote tonight.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, a large number of Senators have left the Chamber under the assurance, from some sources, that a vote on the bill would not be taken this evening. Therefore I do not think it practicable to conclude the consideration of the bill today, although I hope it may be finished early tomorrow. I understand that is agreeable to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] and to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN].

Mr. MCCARRAN. It is entirely agreeable to me.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF AGREEMENTS—ADDRESS BY SENATOR COSTIGAN

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, on April 28, 1934, the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], a former member of the United States Tariff Commission, during an address over the National Broadcasting System, in the course of a debate with the noted New York editor and author, Mr. Oswald Garrison Villard, assigned reasons for supporting the bill—H.R. 8687—now before the Senate for the promotion of foreign trade, which aims to invest the President with tariff-bargaining powers.

I ask unanimous consent to have the remarks of the Senator from Colorado printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and to lie upon the table.

The address was ordered to lie upon the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR EDWARD P. COSTIGAN, OF COLORADO, IN A DEBATE ON THE "NEW DEAL AND THE TARIFF" WITH MR. OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD OVER THE NATIONAL BROADCASTING SYSTEM, WASHINGTON, D.C., APRIL 28, 1934

It gives me special pleasure to discuss the tariff and the new deal with Mr. Villard. For a generation he has consistently urged the material and human values of our national stake in international commerce. None have seen more clearly than he that fair trade is not one-sided but two-sided. Like the spirit of true religion, it blesses him who gives and him who takes. Mr. Villard affirms all this. He and I, therefore, will not contentiously debate, however, we may differ on methods. We do not accept the frequent fallacy that we do well to keep all our money and all our goods within our borders. That assertion both forgets and claims too much. If true, the rule should be extended to States, cities, and families, and the doom of trade between countries and human beings would be written by self-centered, noncooperative individuals deprived of many near-necessities and most of the luxuries of civilization.

TARIFFS STRANGLING INTERNATIONAL TRADE

We are agreed that excessive tariffs, including those of the United States, are strangling international trade, and that rationally reduced tariffs will do much to promote prosperity in a stricken world. Prohibitive tariffs, barring the commerce of nation after nation for a dozen years, following the short-sighted lead of this country, have been the ripe fruit of excessive nationalism, which is wealth retarding, not wealth creating. Our decline in foreign commerce, since the Tariff Act of 1930 was approved by President Hoover, has been staggering and a major factor in the continuing depression of almost 4 years since that law was enacted. In 1929 our combined imports and exports were $9,219,000,000. By 1931 these totals had shrunk to $4,515,000,000, a decline of 52 percent in imports and of 54 percent in exports below 1929. In 1933 our total of imports and exports had further shrunk to $3,124,000,000, a decline in imports of 67 percent and in exports of 68 percent below the figures of 1929. It is noteworthy that the proportionate decline in our foreign trade in those years was greater by some 11 to 23 percent than our parallel and combined decline in domestic manufacturing, mining, crops, and livestock.

What this drying up of commerce has meant in lost profits, diminished employment, and human misery in this country and abroad, informed persons know and the general public suspects. However, the real question now at issue is—what, if anything, can be done about it? A new deal is imperatively required. Whether liked or not, new remedies must be tried. Old medicines have lost their curative force. The hour has come to throw open the doors of welcome to the courageous leadership of new physicians, not passively but actively looking to public opinion to appraise benefits flowing from progressive trade improvement, until sanity and wisdom, without which the people perish, take command. Not without reason one discovers in Mr. Villard's opening remarks a note of pessimism over the probable slow progress of tariff-bargaining. True, other tariff-reducing plans, one by one, have been tried and cast aside. We must, however, not despair for we cannot afford despair. In such an hour gloom can become the barricade behind which standpat tariff beneficiaries take refuge in our disaster. Yesterday, in prosperity, their slogan was "Don't rock the boat." Today, in adversity, it is equally barren—"Nothing can be done." In contrast, what creative mind will hesitate to test the tariff-reducing, trade-enriching possibilities of moderate experiments with bargaining tariffs?

TARIFF-BARGAINING POSSIBILITIES

In such an era it is important to recognize that all tariff-bargaining gates are not closed. Following the last election, and before inauguration, I conferred with then President-elect Roosevelt with a view to securing, with the help of the United States Tariff Commission, for use in tariff bargaining, little-known facts showing profitable subjects and areas for advantageous trade agreements with leading foreign countries. Later I introduced in the United States Senate resolutions, which the Senate approved, calling for reports from the Tariff Commission. Those reports, long since printed, are in various respects distinctly creditable to the experts of that Federal agency and are now being used by governmental officials. If the proposed bargaining authority is given, the assembled material will helpfully assist President Roosevelt in negotiating advantageous agreements. I mention these facts to emphasize that there are larger possibilities of mutually beneficial commerce flowing from reciprocal trade agreements than critics of bargaining methods are prone to admit. Let me recall, solely for illustration, that the Tariff Commission's statistics on imports include lists of definite articles burdened by tariffs although those articles are not produced in this country; articles of which imports are less than 5 percent of domestic production, although even high tariff advocates profess to favor competition as a restraint on monopolistic prices; articles on which tariff duties exceed—in some cases far exceed—50 percent ad valorem; articles which are more or less not competitive with domestic products; and articles with respect to which foreign countries possess decided advantages in production.

It ought to be evident that among such articles will be found fertile opportunities for profitable trade bargaining to open closed markets to our products of farms and factories. There was a day, not beyond the memory of man, when our foreign commerce was a source of national pride as well as gain, and when ardent tariff spokesmen in this country would have denounced duties calculated to raise the price of domestic articles in excess of 50 percent above their imported value. In that day tariff rates exceeding 50 percent ad valorem would have been treated by most tariff advocates as extravagantly excessive. Today in high tariff circles all moderation has been dropped in pressing tariff demands of those who do not hesitate to use the national taxing power for their private profit. Noncompetitive as well as competitive articles are now indiscriminately chosen to support not competitive but prohibitive tariff barriers. The Tariff Commission's figures indicate that in 1931 and 1932 hundreds of commodities were being imported into the United States in quantities of less than 1 percent in each instance of our domestic production. As examples, among these articles, to choose at random, were denatured alcohol with a tariff duty equivalent in 1932 to 114 percent; linseed oil, 77 to 97 percent; toilet waters containing alcohol, 110 to 118 percent; salt in bulk, 59 to 68 percent; aluminum household utensils, 56 to 60 percent; and clocks and clock movements about 107 percent.

In another tabulation, which represents dutiable articles not produced in the United States in commercial quantities, will be found glass buttons with a duty of about 76 percent; pipes, not specifically provided for, 96 percent; hats and hoods of wool knit outer wear (not embroidered), 116 percent; hand-made lace of cotton and lace window curtains, not specifically provided for, of cotton and other vegetable fiber, 90 percent.

Clearly we have here illustrations of possibilities for trade expansion—in some instances by the reduction of duties to a minimum in exchange for bargaining advantages abroad; in others through the moderation of duties which will permit that competitive rivalry for markets which through most of our history has been regarded as a source of trade wealth and a wholesome check on monopolistic prices. The illustrations given are few, and the list might be greatly expanded, but it suffices to suggest that, in the tariff-bargaining field, many tariffs can be reduced without damage to domestic industries and with affirmative benefits to our commerce, industry, and the consuming public. It is not generally known that although many tariff duties in the tariff law of 1930 were inexcusably high at the time, changes in prices and the devaluation of money since that date have made those and other rates prohibitive, and far beyond the rates intended when the law was written, on literally hundreds of commercial articles. Here, too, is a fruitful field for tariff-bargaining. No inconsistency exists between such a program and the determination not to lower tariff duties to a point where any of our natural industries need be injured.

PROMOTING NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL WELFARE

It is probably unnecessary at this time to demonstrate further the need for a new approach to the solution of our tariff problems. With tariffs, as with other legislative subjects, it would appear indispensable with ceaseless vigilance to attack unsound policies, however long practiced and seemingly deep-rooted. Not the least reason for trying tariff bargaining as a step toward lower duties, as proposed in pending legislation, is the fact that other methods have failed, too often for unworthy reasons, to produce tariff reductions, and that no other comparably promising program fits the present hour. Even in this period of intense nationalism there are many signs that America's intelligent tariff judgment has been subordinated by other issues rather than driven from the field, and that public opinion is disposed if, as, and when competitive conditions permit, under rational leadership, to lower its tariff barriers.

It appears certain that sane leadership in America today stands ready to resist selfish and log-rolling special interests, which alike in Congress and through the Tariff Commission, have at times used and abused the taxing power of our Government for their private profit, regardless of public needs and welfare. In concluding my remarks I, therefore, urge, in part:

That legislative steps be now taken in return for reciprocal reductions in foreign markets to bring about reductions of tariff duties, especially on manufactured articles, which are higher than required by reasonable competitive standards and conditions.

That reductions of excessive tariff rates be particularly pressed on bargaining lines with respect to the products of manufacturing industries, which are monopolistic in character, and in which price-fixing tends to eliminate the wholesome effects of desirable competition.

That future tariff levels be determined by our manifest national interest and tested by proven benefits to workers, farmers, and consumers.

That it is as proper in times like the present of acute farm distress, to use tariff instrumentalities, in one form or another, to stimulate more prosperous farm conditions, as it has been heretofore to subsidize industrial development.

That in broad terms our aim should be to provide suitable administrative machinery and to seek economic disarmament, here and abroad, by bringing about, where advantages outweigh disadvantages, reductions in foreign hostile and retaliatory tariffs simultaneously with reductions in our own excessive tariffs.

Finally, and speaking generally, that our national tariff policies be rescued from their present trend toward Chinese-Wall exclusion, with the definite goal of mutually profitable commerce with foreign nations, strengthening and improving international good will and friendship.

CONFIRMATION OF WILLIAM A. ROBERTS

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, on Saturday last the Senate confirmed the nomination of Mr. William A. Roberts to be people's counsel for the District of Columbia. On the day before I had asked that the nomination go over. I was absent from the Chamber when it was brought up on Saturday, and when I returned to the Chamber I asked that the vote be reconsidered.

I now ask that the vote whereby the nomination was confirmed be reconsidered, and that the nomination be placed on the Executive Calendar. In explanation, I desire to say that I make the request merely for the purpose of enabling me to make an investigation in order to satisfy myself as to certain matters, I being a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, as I recall the incident, objection was made by the Senator during an executive session.

Mr. McCARRAN. On Friday.

Mr. McNARY. The nomination is still on the Executive Calendar, is it not?

Mr. McCARRAN. The nomination was confirmed on Saturday while I was out of the Chamber.

Mr. McNARY. I was not familiar with that circumstance.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the nomination was acted on through an oversight. My attention was not called to the objection which the Senator from Nevada had made; and the request for reconsideration should be granted, without doubt.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada asks that the vote by which the nomination was confirmed be reconsidered and that the nomination be returned to the Executive Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE JUDICIARY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Anton J. Lukaszewicz to be United States marshal for the eastern district of Wisconsin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Alex McKenzie Vierhus to be collector of internal revenue, district of Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Vierhus to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Washington.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I objected on Saturday because sufficient notice had not been given through the publication of the calendar; but I have no objection today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Mabel Gittinger to be collector of customs, district no. 44, Des Moines, Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the confirmation en bloc of the postmasters whose names appear on the Executive Calendar? The Chair hears none, and the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the Calendar.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, APRIL 30, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed be the name of the Lord our God; with true hearts may we bend ourselves at the altar of prayer. To Thy will may we be true and live in fellowship with our fellow men. By our knowledge, or in our station, forbid, Heavenly Father, that we should become indifferent to their necessities. Do Thou encourage in this Chamber the sentiment of brotherhood; let it work freely and gladly in all directions, alleviating any imaginary or real difficulties. We pray, blessed Lord, forgiveness may take the place of retaliation, sacrifice in the place of indulgence, and union the place of rivalry. Help us to magnify Thy mercies in the spirit of gratitude. Hearken, our Heavenly Father, when peace and contentment wrestle with worry and anxiety, strengthen us with the higher joys, which are heavenly and divine. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, April 27, 1934, were read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 8854. An act to amend the District of Columbia Alcoholic Beverage Control Act by amending sections 11, 22, 23, and 24.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2442. An act for the protection of the municipal water supply of the city of Salt Lake City, State of Utah;

S. 3170. An act to revise air-mail laws; and

S. 3404. An act authorizing loans from the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works for the construction of certain municipal buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT BUILDING

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 8889) to provide for the custody and maintenance of the United States Supreme Court Building and the equipment and grounds thereof, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. LANHAM. I shall be pleased to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand, this is a unanimous report from the gentleman's committee, and is a minor amendment providing for something that should be done?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes; it was simply felt in the Senate that by section 4 of the bill certain minor matters of supervision were placed under the direction of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and that they would be unnecessarily burdensome to him. The Senate thought it unnecessary to impose such additional burden upon the Chief Justice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes after disposition of conference reports and other matters on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

THE TAX BILL

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL submitted a conference report on the bill (H.R. 7835) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 1385).

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman from Washington inform the House when it is intended to take up the conference report on the tax bill?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Tomorrow morning.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, may I ask in this connection whether at this time the gentleman from Washington can give any indication as to whether or not he will allow an extension of time beyond the usual time for consideration of conference reports?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I would not care to agree upon any extension of time at the present moment. I believe 1 hour is permitted under the rules, and I would not care to agree to any extension of time now.

Mr. SNELL. When the time comes, I am sure the gentleman will be a little more generous than he now indicates.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; and I thought he would be pleased to know that we hope to have additional time on this side to discuss the conference report.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I appreciate that.

CHICAGO WORLD'S FAIR CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION

Mr. SABATH, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged report (No. 1391), which was read and referred to the House Calendar:

House Resolution 360

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 3235. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Library, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage, without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

EVA B. FRENCH

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution (H.Res. 341, Rept. No. 1387) from the Committee on Accounts and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 341

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to Eva B. French, widow of Samuel H. French, late an employee of the House, an amount equal to 6 months' compensation, and an additional amount, not to exceed $250, to defray funeral expenses of the said Samuel H. French.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Mr. COX, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged report (Rept. No. 1388), which was read and referred to the House Calendar:

House Resolution 364

Resolved, That there is hereby created a select committee to be composed of 5 Members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker, 1 of whom he shall designate as chairman. Any vacancy occurring in the membership of the committee shall be filled in the manner in which the original appointment is made.

SEC. 2. The committee is authorized and directed to investigate the administration of the code of fair competition for the petroleum industry and such other person or persons as may have information pertaining thereto on practices obtaining in the petroleum industry as defined in such code, and on prices and production quotas effective since the approval of such code, with a view to ascertaining whether any such practice, price, or quota is unjust and inequitable to any interest involved; and if so, whether further legislation is necessary for the protection of such interest. The administrator of the code of fair competition for the petroleum industry is requested to cooperate with the committee in carrying out the purposes of this resolution.

SEC. 3. The committee shall report to the House during the present session of Congress the results of its (consultations and) investigations, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable.

SEC. 4. For the purpose of this resolution the committee is authorized to sit and act during the present session of Congress in the District of Columbia as a whole or by subcommittee at such times, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, by subpena or otherwise, and to take such testimony as it deems necessary.

The chairman of the committee or any subcommittee thereof may administer oaths to witnesses.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 2 or 3 minutes to propound some inquiries to the majority leader, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. May I ask what we are going to take up for consideration today?

Mr. BYRNS. I understand the rule making the Rayburn or stock-exchange bill in order will be called up.

Mr. RANKIN. It was my understanding the other day, and the understanding of a good many of us, that we were going to take up the Johnson bill first. This bill has been passed by the Senate. It has also been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary and a rule was reported from the Rules Committee, I understand, before the rule on the stock-exchange bill was reported. There are a great many Members who are interested in this measure and from the flood of propaganda coming to the Congress from the Power Trust and other utilities against the measure, it looks as if the whole country is interested in it. These insidious interests are trying in every way they can to influence Members of Congress against this Johnson bill and in favor of the Lewis amendment. We are very anxious to have this bill considered—and when I say "we", I mean a majority of the Members on this side of the House—and I want to ask the majority leader when we may expect to have the Johnson bill come to the floor of the House for consideration under the rule.

Mr. BYRNS. I may say to the gentleman that there will be such opportunity, of course. If the stock-exchange bill is taken up today, as I understand it will be, it will take several days to conclude its consideration, or, possibly, all the week. I have been informed that those who are in charge of the conference report on the revenue bill expect to call up that measure tomorrow. I do not anticipate it will take all day, but it will require, perhaps, several hours. I think then the decks will be clear so the bill referred to by the gentleman can be taken up. It was intended to take it up last week, but owing to circumstances with which the gentleman is familiar, it was impossible to do that, and, of course, it will have to await the consideration of the stock-exchange bill, which had been scheduled for today.

Mr. RANKIN. It was not necessary for it to be supplanted by this bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield to me? I reported the rule on the Johnson bill. We figured that it would take 2 days to dispose of that bill. It gives 6 hours general debate. I consulted the leadership of the House at that time, and it was distinctly arranged that it would follow the stock-exchange bill. It being a Senate bill there is not so much need for haste as if it were a House bill.

Mr. RANKIN. May we have the assurance from the gentleman from New York in charge of the rule and also the assurance of the majority leader that it will be taken up immediately after the disposition of the stock-exchange bill?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am not an assurer; I take orders.

Mr. RANKIN. We have all the influences necessary to give us assurance——

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. COX. The gentleman will recall the circumstances under which this bill is to be taken up. This is a major proposition.

Mr. RANKIN. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] that I am not complaining that the stock-exchange bill is to be taken up. I am for that measure. I think it is very necessary. But I want the Johnson bill taken up next, and I express the sentiment and attitude of a large percentage of the House. What I want is an assurance from the leadership. What I want is some assurance that the Johnson bill will be taken up immediately after the disposition of the stock-exchange bill.

Mr. BYRNS. I want to say to the gentleman that there is not the slightest disposition on the part of anyone, so far as I know, to delay the consideration of the Johnson bill. As a matter of fact, I had expected it would be taken up last week, but the gentleman is familiar with the circumstances that interfered with that. The stock-exchange bill was scheduled for today; and inasmuch as we did not take up the Johnson bill last week, it will have to wait the consideration of this particular bill. Personally, I have no objection to the Johnson bill following this, as far as that is concerned. There are a number of crime bills which the Department of Justice is pressing for consideration. I think it will take but a few hours to dispose of those, and the gentleman knows the urgent need for the passage of those bills at this time.

Mr. RANKIN. The need for the passage of those bills is not as urgent, in my opinion, as the immediate passage of the Johnson bill. I want it understood that I am not criticizing the majority leader.

Mr. BYRNS. I can assure the gentleman that the Johnson bill will be taken up—there is no question about that, but there is a question whether the crime bills should be first considered.

Mr. RANKIN. I should like to have the Johnson bill taken up before the consideration of the crime bills.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not know whether the crime bills have been completed; we have not granted a rule from the Rules Committee.

Mr. BYRNS. I hope they will be taken up by general consent; I do not think there is any disposition to oppose them.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand; but the rule for the Johnson bill has already been reported. It was reported ahead of this rule that we are going to consider today. What we want is to have the Johnson bill taken up immediately after the disposition of the stock-exchange bill.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], in charge of the Lewis-Johnson bill for the Rules Committee, has given the gentleman from Mississippi assurance that he will take it up at the first opportunity, which I understand to be very soon after the conclusion of the stock-exchange bill.

Mr. BYRNS. I shall not have any objection to that.

Mr. RANKIN. That is satisfactory. That will insure its passage this week.

LET PATRIOTISM CONTROL EXPAND MONEY CIRCULATION

Mr. STRONG of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend by remarks in the RECORD by including an address that I delivered at Garfield Memorial Hall.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRONG of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address made by me at Garfield Memorial Hall, Washington, D.C., April 26, 1934:

I am greatly honored by the invitation extended me to address this assembly concerning policies of government. I am aware of the responsibilities resting upon those who are chosen to participate in the administration of our Government's affairs and accept your invitation with a deep feeling of duty.

The greatest possession allotted to mankind is life. To protect life and property and aid the people in right living, in order that peace and happiness may prevail, governments are formed. Our patriotic forefathers endowed us with the greatest Government on earth, and if there ever was a time, since the Declaration of Independence was written, which demands patriotic service in behalf of all the people in our Government's affairs, that hour has arrived.

The citizen who answers his country's call in time of war is a hero and a patriot. When our country entered the World War, practically the entire citizenship of the Nation rallied to the flag, while our boys were at the front in France and did its full duty. A great victory was the result. We are now desperately battling to overcome a great business depression, which has caused more suffering of the people throughout the United States than all the wars in the history of our Nation. Winning this war against this awful depression will bring prosperity and happiness to the people. This requires heroism and patriotism such as was exhibited by all during the World War. Not dying for our country, but living for it; not hard fighting, but hard thinking in order that our problems of government may be solved, not in the interest of a certain class, but in behalf of all the people.

Patriotism and heroism, which means loyalty and unselfishness, must be as outstanding in public officials who administer our Federal, State, and local governments, as that exhibited by the true soldier on the field of battle when his country is involved in war. The people are thoroughly equipped to win this battle against depression and can win such a complete victory that the enemy "depression" can never enter this country of ours again. The founders of our Government placed the ballot in the hands of the people and this is the weapon with which to win this battle.

In 1928 there were 72,000,000 voters in the United States and only about thirty-six millions of these participated in the Presidential election of that year. In other words, only one half the number of voters of the Nation wielded the weapon (the ballot) placed in our hands to win all battles over wrong in our Government's affairs. We cannot win victories for right in that way. The enemies of good Government all vote at each election, and when only one half of the voters of the country are alined in battle it is easy for the enemy to win. Therefore, if we are to have a Government administered for the benefit of all the people, each voter must do his full duty in creating such conditions. This can certainly be accomplished by the sincere, intelligent use of the ballot.

If I fail to do my full duty in seeing that a government is maintained which will extend exact justice to all I should not complain if I suffer great injustice, for I am simply reaping that which I have sown. It is therefore a plain, open truth that we must do our full duty as citizens in order that peace, prosperity, and happiness may prevail, and life and property be protected. Let us remove all the splints and bandages and have a full-strength government rendering service to all the people.

As time advances there will be problems of government demanding our attention which must be honestly considered and properly solved, not in the interest of a few but for the benefit of all citizens. Let us bring our politics up to patriotism, our citizenship up to Christianity, and our ballot up to the Bible. If we will do this, all governmental problems will be settled right.

One of the great questions before the people for their adjustment today is the financial system of our Government. I am sure all citizens who have given the matter serious and unbiased study are satisfied the awful business depression, which has brought untold suffering to millions of our people, was brought about because of insufficient money in circulation. This can be easily adjusted, if we earnestly and intelligently determine to undertake the task.

In discussing finances, I am reminded of a statement made by a good friend who has given the question of finances special study for many years, and has much knowledge of all its phases. He says, many citizens believe the money problem is so intricate that only a few experts possess knowledge of same. He claims the circulation of money is as simple as the circulation of water through a water system and illustrates by saying: "A man is on the water main near a cut-off with a wrench in his hand. This man can easily regulate the quantity of water flowing through the entire system. He can give the exact amount required, or refuse to allow the necessary amount to circulate, or cut off the water supply entirely." This is a splendid illustration, and will rightfully appeal to anyone who will unselfishly consider this question. The Constitution of the United States plainly states that Congress shall issue money and regulate its value. Congress has not obeyed this plain mandate of the Constitution, but has permitted this important function of our Government to be controlled by a few malicious manipulators who have conducted the financial system in a manner that has brought ruin to the business interests of our country, and caused the depression which has prevailed the past few years, which has brought awful suffering to millions of our people.

Had someone announced a few years ago there would soon come a time when our country would be overflowing with food products and clothing material but there would be millions of people suffering in that period, because they could not procure necessary food and clothing, that person would have been pronounced insane. That condition has prevailed for several years, and is so contrary to the truth we could not have believed such could have possibly occurred had we not witnessed same with all its intense suffering. Congress is vested with power to bring relief by establishing a financial system which would forever prevent the return of business depressions.

When relief of the people is mentioned by expansion of the circulation of money, these malicious manipulators of our money system begin to yell, "Fiat money", "Printing-press money", and spread their malicious propaganda all over the country, through the newspapers and otherwise. They know that money issued as the Constitution provides would be the best money on earth. But these manipulators want money to be scarce in order that the rate of interest will remain high, and leave them in absolute control. They are the same class of people our Lord scourged from the temple. They scorn the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount.

There should be no speculation in money; it should be plentiful at all times, and the rate of interest low. This would cause the prices of real estate, farm products, livestock, and all other commodities or property to advance in value. Wages and salaries would also be raised and prosperity in general would prevail. Someone has said if they could control the circulation of money in any country they could absolutely control the entire government of that country. We know this is true, and the great battle now on is to liberate our Government from the malicious dictatorship of the manipulators of our money system.

I believe all will agree that Mr. Edison was a very wise, practical man and a patriot who rendered great service to his country and gave much thought concerning the welfare of the people. Speaking about money he says: "I think we are getting a sound idea on the money question. The people have an instinct which tells them something is wrong, and the wrong somehow centers in money. Under the old way any time we wish to add to the national wealth we are compelled to add to the national debt." He refers to issuing bonds which draw interest and borrowing money on these bonds with which to make public improvements. He says: "If our Nation can issue a dollar bond it can issue a dollar bill. The same element which makes the bond good makes the bill good also. The difference between the bond and the bill is that the bond lets the money brokers collect twice the amount of the bond, whereas the currency draws no interest.

"If the Government issues bonds it simply induces the money brokers to draw money out of the legitimate channels of trade to buy the bonds; if the Government issues currency it provides itself with enough money to increase the national wealth without disturbing the business of the country, and in doing this it increases its income without adding a penny to its debt.

"It is absurd to say our country can issue bonds and cannot issue currency, but one fattens the usurer and the other helps the people. If the currency issued by the Government were no good, then the bonds issued would be no good either. It is a terrible situation when the Government, to increase its national wealth, must go into debt and submit to ruinous interest charges at the hands of men who control the fictitious value of gold.

"Let us look at it another way. If the Government issues bonds the brokers will sell them. The bonds will be negotiable; they will be considered as gilt-edged paper. Why? Because the Government is behind them. But who is behind the Government? The people. Therefore, it is the people who constitute the basis of Government credit. Why, then, cannot the people have the benefit of their own gilt-edged credit by receiving noninterest-bearing currency instead of the brokers receiving the benefit of the people's credit in interest-bearing bonds?

"The people must pay anyway; why should they be compelled to pay twice, as the bond system compels them to pay? The people of the United States always accept their Government's currency. If the United States will adopt this policy of increasing its national wealth without contributing to the interest collector—for the whole national debt is made up on interest charges—then you will see an era of progress and prosperity in this country such as could never have come otherwise."

Mr. Edison says much more on the money question, but I have given the basic facts mainly of his statement, which show our Government has issued interest-bearing bonds instead of money, and the national debt today is about $26,000,000,000 and the people are paying interest on this vast sum at the rate of more than $1,000,000 per day.

After the War between the States, President Lincoln asked that the Constitution be obeyed in regard to issuing money. His request was granted, and Congress issued currency with which to pay the war debts of the Government. Three hundred and forty-six million dollars of that money has remained in circulation, and it is in circulation today. No better money exists on earth.

Because currency was issued with which to pay the war debt, instead of interest-bearing bonds, the people of the United States have been saved about $12,000,000,000. This causes us to consider what is commonly called the "soldier's bonus." When the World War ended a great number of our World War veterans were issued, by the Government, adjusted-compensation certificates for services rendered our country during this awful war. These certificates are payable in 1945 and amount to more than $2,000,000,000. To pay these certificates now would save the Government considerably more than $1,000,000,000, and under House bill No. 1 by Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN, it would not cost the people one penny. This bill calls for issuing $2,215,000,000 in currency which can be based on the gold in the United States Treasury. I mention basing the currency on gold in order that there can possibly be no objection to the value of the money. This would pay the World War veterans a debt which is actually due them, for which they hold the obligations of our Government, and save the people more than $1,000,000,000 by paying it now, besides relieving thousands of our World War veterans from want and suffering. That is not all the benefits to be derived. It would place $2,215,000,000 in circulation, bring much-needed aid to the farmer, merchant, banker, manufacturer, and all other business enterprises.

There has passed the lower House of Congress at this time a bill authorizing payment of the service certificates which the Government owes the World War veterans. If this meaure becomes law, it will place about $100,000,000 in Texas, and more than $5,000,000 in Dallas County, and will not cost the citizens of Texas or of Dallas County one cent, but will relieve the want and suffering of several thousand World War veterans besides being a great help financially to all the people. I am stating facts no one can deny, and it is really puzzling when any person opposes the World War veterans being paid what the Government owes them under the terms of House bill No. 1. Let us summarize the whole matter: It will bring relief to many thousands of World War veterans and their families. It will greatly relieve the awful business depression now prevailing. It will not cost the taxpayer one cent.

Not only do these malicious manipulators control the circulation of the money of our country but they control the credit also, and can contract both the circulation of money and the extension of credit. We have witnessed all this and have seen thousands of our farmers, bankers, merchants, manufacturers, and all other classes of business absolutely ruined.

There are measures now pending in Congress either of which will correctly adjust our financial system, thereby bringing relief and prosperity to the people. Chief among such measures is one requiring the Government to issue money instead of issuing interest-bearing bonds. Another measure is to reestablish the coinage of silver which was used as money from the time our Government was founded up to 1873, at which time its coinage was abandoned without the consent of the American people. Eighty-four percent of the silver of the world is produced on this side of the Atlantic Ocean, and up to 1873 the silver dollar was at par with gold and would be so today only for the crime of its fraudulent demonetization. Those who have discussed the question of finances with our President say he favors the expansion of money circulation. Therefore, we should secure such legislation and relieve the country of this awful business depression without further delay.

The solution of the financial question in a legal, sensible way will bring prosperity to all classes of business, thereby relieving the suffering of millions of people. There are other issues needing the attention of Congress which I desire to fully discuss at a later date.

When President Roosevelt was inaugurated March 4, 1933, all business of every character was ruined, starvation was abroad in the land. Relief must come and come quickly; therefore, the President at once launched temporary measures to relieve the suffering in order that his administration may proceed to bring permanent relief to the entire Nation. No President has assumed a greater task than Franklin D. Roosevelt. He is actively and sincerely using all efforts possible to administer the affairs of Government in the interest of all the people, and needs the earnest support of all loyal citizens; for no man on this earth has more weighty problems, duties, and responsibilities making demands upon him than has our President.

I have not agreed at all times with our President, and I doubt if there is a Member of either branch of Congress who has fully agreed with him in all he has said and done; for that reason, I have supported him as loyally as any Member. He would have no respect for a man who did not try, at least, to think for himself; neither would the people respect such a man; and I could not properly respect myself did I not undertake to solve questions which demand my sincere and thoughtful attention. I believe our President is very sincere; and if he receives no more opposition than that coming from me, his policies will largely prevail.

FARM RELIEF

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the courtesy of the House in granting me permission to present a statement which relates to the splendid assistance which has been given by this administration to those who till the soil.

When it is taken into consideration that the source of practically all wealth comes from the ground, it must be conceded that unless our farmers can be maintained in a satisfactory manner other occupations will likewise suffer. Therefore, I am proud that I have had the opportunity to vote for all the recovery bills which have been sponsored by the Roosevelt administration, and the following statements made in a letter to a friend are self-explanatory:

DEAR FRIEND: I am sure that you will be interested in having me give you some information relative to matters of vital importance to every citizen in the Nation.

When the present administration took over the affairs of this Government, farms were being foreclosed, the price of farm commodities was the lowest for many years, our foreign trade was at a low ebb, and banking conditions were anything but good. If President Roosevelt had not been possessed with the kind of courage and bulldog tenacity to blaze new paths in the way of providing humanitarian legislation, anything might have happened. To say the least, our country was in the throes of an economic war, which might have resulted in more fatalities than the World War.

The President's program has caused our farmers to receive some $200,000,000, and it is estimated that before the end of 1934 the total amount furnished by the Government will exceed $1,000,000,000. Such payments will be as follows: To producers of corn and hogs, a little over $367,000,000; wheat growers, $148,000,000; tobacco growers, $35,000,000; cotton growers, $173,000,000; dairy farmers, $150,000,000; corn loans, $111,000,000; cotton loans, $110,000,000. In addition, $150,000,000 will be paid to the producers of dairy and beef cattle.

I have always taken the position that the war profiteers, big business, and those who have been able to enrich themselves because of monopolies, should be forced to pay the cost of restoring this country to normalcy and, as a member of the Ways and Means Committee, it was my privilege to help stop up the leaks that enabled Morgan, Mellon, Mills, Meyer, and the so-called "silk-stocking crowd" to escape taxation in the past and, through the provisions of the income-tax law, which includes inheritance taxes, they will be compelled to pay in the future. I am proud that President Roosevelt had sufficient courage to stand behind the kind of program which, I believe, will restore this country to normalcy.

We all realize that the bad situation that was brought to our people resulted from years of mismanagement and that it will take some time to right the wrongs of the past. Therefore, I hope I may have your continued cooperation in every matter that relates to the welfare of our Nation, as it is my earnest desire to render to you, and every person in the district, the best service possible.

OLD-AGE PENSION

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, I desire to discuss with you for a short time the necessity of enacting before the close of this session an old-age pension law, to take care of the old people who have been so long neglected.

Twenty-eight States have up to this time passed a law to provide for old-age pensions, and other States would soon fall in line if this Congress would now pass a law to cooperate with the States in caring for them.

I introduced a bill in Congress of this kind. Many other bills of similar nature have been introduced, and from the various bills one of them should be passed. The committee has drafted a bill which would care for them, and I hope the committee will push the bill to its final passage at this session. I shall gladly support it.

Persons that are now over 65 years of age cannot get employment at public works or at anything where they can make a living. They are the real soldiers of our country that have fought long and hard to make a Government fit to live under. They have set up for us a high standard of morals and have aided in establishing the best Government in the world; and they should not be forgotten, but should be taken care of to the very best of our ability. The matter of caring for them has been delayed too long, so let us do it now before the close of this Congress.

Every other nation with the ability of ours has for many years had legislation of this kind, and we should not delay it longer.

Day by day they are being called to the eternal home, and I am sure that in their declining days it would be a real joy to them to know that the great Government they helped to build had shown its appreciation for their services in this way.

I ask each of you Members of Congress who are interested in an old-age pension law to join me in an earnest appeal for the consideration of this legislation at once.

OWNERSHIP OF TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, I present a privileged report on House Resolution 291, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 291

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the House of Representatives the following information: The names and addresses of all persons and corporations who own tax-exempt securities in the amount of $100,000 or over, the amount of such holdings held by each individual or corporation, kind of securities held in each case, and the interest paid on such securities per annum.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

REPORT NO. 1389

(Adverse report to accompany House Resolution 291)

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the resolution (H.Res. 291) to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit to the House of Representatives certain information with respect to the ownership of tax-exempt securities, having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House and recommend that the resolution do not pass.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, in that connection I ask that the Clerk read a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
April 10, 1934.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have your latter, dated March 22, 1934, enclosing two copies of House Resolution 291 and a statement in support thereof by Representative FISH, who introduced the resolution. The resolution provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to transmit to the House of Representatives the names and addresses of all persons and corporations who own tax-exempt securties in the amount of $100,000 or over, the amount held by each individual or corporation, the kind of securities in each case, and the interest per annum paid thereon. A subcommittee, of which you are chairman, has the resolution under consideration and you desire a statement from the Treasury Department before making your report.

Section 22 (b) (4) of the Revenue Act of 1932, which excludes from gross income interest derived from securities described in the resolution, requires every person owning any such securities to submit with his income-tax return a statement showing the number and amount of such securities owned by him and the income received therefrom. A statement showing the total amount of tax-exempt securities held and the amount of income derived from such securities by all taxpayers having net incomes of $5,000 or more could very easily be furnished, since such information is compiled each year for statistical purposes, but the only manner in which such information could be obtained with reference to individual taxpayers would be by examination of each and every income-tax return filed for the period to be covered by the report.

For the taxable year 1931 the individual returns filed totaled 3,116,317, while the number of corporation returns was 493,293, and for 1932 the returns filed to August 31, 1933, were 3,760,402 individual returns and 481,368 corporation returns. The resolution does not show whether the information is desired for a particular taxable year or a period including several taxable years, but it is apparent from the figures given that the preparation of a statement containing the desired information would require a very considerable period of time and large additional expense. Many of the returns are located in the offices of the collector of internal revenue throughout the country, while others are in the hands of revenue agents, who are making audits of the books and records of the taxpayers. Others are in process of review in the offices of the Bureau of Internal Revenue here in Washington. Compilation of the information called for in the resolution would necessitate the employment of an additional clerical force and would greatly handicap the Bureau in its present efforts in collecting delinquent taxes.

Very truly yours,

H. MORGENTHAU, Jr.,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. C. C. DICKINSON,
Chairman Subcommittee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman does that will he yield to a question? This is a serious matter.

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield purely for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. Why is it that the Congress of the United States is not entitled to this information? I do not care what it costs, the time has come in the history of this country when the Membership of the House, at least, ought to know these facts.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield any further. I yielded simply for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. I am in favor of this resolution and against tabling it, and this Department ought to get this data for Congress, and I am in favor of getting the information. I cannot understand why this committee would take this action.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 87, noes 39.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio demands the yeas and nays. As many as are in favor of taking this vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Fourteen members have arisen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

On motion of Mr. DICKINSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table was laid on the table.

EMERGENCY CONSTRUCTION OF PUBLIC HIGHWAYS

Mr. DRIVER, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution for printing under the rules, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 365 (Report No. 1390)

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 8781, a bill to increase employment by authorizing an appropriation to provide emergency construction of public highways and related projects, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Roads, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

REFERRING CLAIMS OF TURTLE MOUNTAIN BANDS OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS TO THE COURT OF CLAIMS

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill S. 326, referring the claims of the Turtle Mountain Band or Bands of Chippewa Indians of North Dakota to the Court of Claims for adjudication and settlement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma calls up a conference report, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the conference report.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 326) referring the claims of the Turtle Mountain Band or Bands of Chippewa Indians of North Dakota to the Court of Claims for adjudication and settlement, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same.

WILBURN CARTWRIGHT,
DENNIS CHAVEZ,
HUBERT H. PEAVEY,
Managers on the part of the House.
HENRY F. ASHURST,
ELMER THOMAS,
LYNN J. FRAZIER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (S. 326) referring the claims of the Turtle Mountain Band or Bands of Chippewa Indians of North Dakota to the Court of Claims for adjudication and settlement, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report:

The amendment adopted by the House and agreed to by the conferees eliminates a provision authorizing the payment, upon approval by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, of actual court costs from the funds of the Turtle Mountain Chippewa Indians on deposit in the Treasury of the United States. No such funds are so on deposit, and the provision eliminated would therefore be ineffective. Its elimination leaves open to the Indians the way to meet the court costs in whatever manner may be most feasible for them.

WILBURN CARTWRIGHT,
DENNIS CHAVEZ,
HUBERT H. PEAVEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I want to call the attention of the House to what it is doing in connection with bills of this character. It is too late to take any action on this report, but I rise to give some information as well as issue a warning we must be careful in the future.

In the past few years the Congress has passed 31 jurisdictional bills, involving $800,000,000. They confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to determine all legal and equitable claims of certain Indian tribes against the United States. On April 4 the House passed this bill and it now comes from the conferees. Another bill has just been reported by the House committee.

The original claimants, if they had a claim, are long since dead, and if claims are allowed descendants, generations removed from the original claimants will receive the benefits.

Of course, claims attorneys revive these claims, and they, too, will reap financial benefit if a favorable decision is rendered. Personally, I think this practice should stop. You stopped Civil War claims from going to the Court of Claims, and you can do so in claims of this kind.

It costs the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars for the Comptroller General to get up a defense for the Department of Justice to present in opposition in the Court of Claims.

I simply want to call the attention of the House to bills of this character, and I think we should pay more attention to them in the future than we have in the past.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. I am familiar with what the gentleman has just said, and I know it is true, but that situation will never be changed as long as all of the members on those various committees come from that part of the country that is vitally interested. If the membership on the committees was spread over the whole country, they would give some attention to the matter. That should be stopped, but it never will be stopped until we change the make-up of the committees.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I do not think we should admit that the House as a whole is going to be controlled by the action of committees on matters of this character. I agree with the gentleman, committees should be made up not solely of members who are interested in legislation that the committee considers.

Mr. SNELL. But it is controlled.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It might be. My vote is not controlled by the action of the committee nor is the vote of the gentleman from New York. I thank the gentleman for his statement coming as it does from the Republican leader but my real purpose in rising was to call the attention of the House to what we have been doing so that in the future more serious consideration will be given to such legislation. When such a sum as nearly a billion dollars is involved it is a very serious matter. No one can deny that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

Mr. SNELL. Well, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, because the gentleman has spoken to me, and I know something about what the gentleman intends to say. I do not know that I am favorable to it, but on the other hand I want it understood that I know it is a purely political speech, and if someone on this side should want to make one a little later, I hope there will be no objection from the gentleman's side of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas.

There was no objection.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House, under date of April 21, an Associated Press article appeared in the local newspapers and was carried in practically all the newspapers of the Nation under the glaring headlines "House Democratic Shake-up Expected—Replacing of RAINEY and BYRNS Foreseen After November Election." The article states:

> Some administration men foresee a possible shake-up in the House Democratic leadership after the fall congressional elections.

The thought occurs to us, Who are the administration men who seek or see a shake-up in the Democratic leadership? It would be interesting to know what inspired such an unwarranted article.

The article continues:

> The proposition has been laid before President Roosevelt several times during the present session by friends who have become disturbed over the sometimes rebellious attitude of the top-heavy Democratic majority in the House.

The assumption that the House is rebellious against the new deal or the policies and desires of the President or the administration does not bear the searchlight of investigation and the truth. During the administration there have been 22 test votes on policies and measures advocated by the administration; each and every one of these measures have been passed by overwhelming majorities. At no time has there ever been any rebellion, and the only exception to carrying out the wishes and desires of the Chief Executive is on the recent veterans' legislation. In that instance the Democratic House adopted what is known as a "gag rule" to the independent offices bill. When the measure reached the Senate it was amended to include the veterans' legislation. If the House was rebellious in this instance, the Senate was even in a worse attitude. No leadership nor any influence, even President Roosevelt himself, could have changed that vote. After all, there was very little difference between the views of the Congress and the President. The President is committed to the policy that no veteran should draw a pension by presumption, although the presumption of service connection has been recognized not only by this administration but for time immemorial.

THE BONUS BILL

Nothing could have stopped the passage of the bonus legislation, most of the Membership of the House being committed to this measure. It passed the Seventy-second Congress, when the present leadership was not in charge. In that same Congress, with a Democratic House and a Democratic leadership, at a time when the Ways and Means Committee and the leadership of the House were demanding the sales tax, after days and weeks of insistent demands, it was overwhelmingly defeated, receiving approximately only 40 Democratic votes.

During this time the Democratic House had as its leader a man honored and loved by each Member, one of the greatest men, most forceful leaders and statesmen ever to preside over this body, the Honorable John N. Garner, now Vice President of the United States. [Applause.]

When the controversial administration tariff bill was submitted to this session, out of a Democratic Membership of 313, only 11 Democrats voted against it, whereas in the Seventy-first Congress, with a Democratic Membership of 165, a larger number of Democrats voted for the Smoot-Hawley Tariff law.

Never in the history of congressional legislation has there been such a solidity of its membership to carry out the wishes and desires of its President. It is natural that where there is such an overwhelming majority, coming from every section of the country, constituting inexperienced Members who have more or less made personal commitments, that there would be a difference of opinion and the failure to unite on all administrative measures. Never in the history of any Congress has so much progressive, experimental, and remedial legislation been submitted to an American legislative body. Every Democratic Member on the floor of this House should resent the insinuation that a great portion of its Membership is in a rebellious attitude toward the administration or its leadership. It is not fair to the Membership, and it does not reflect the truth. This House needs no dictatorship in the form of leadership and will accept none, and any one, or any set of men, who would attempt to dictate, domineer, or bulldoze the Membership of this House and not permit them to vote their own honest convictions, would meet with ignominious defeat and failure.

The Membership of the House is fresh from the 435 districts and knows the sentiment of the Nation. Their constituency expects them to exercise good judgment and not be led. Often Members are accused of being rubber stamps and often we do sidetrack our own convictions for the organization and leadership purposes, but we resent being led by a halter, like a mule to water.

This Democratic House has stood and does now stand as a united solid phalanx in its defense of President Roosevelt, his policies, and this administration.

The article further states:

The Chief Executive has been told that the next Congress largely will determine the future of the Democratic Party. The growth of insurgency in the House Democratic ranks recently—the rejection or sidetracking of administration propositions—caused concern among the President's friends at both wings of the Capitol.

We wonder who is so concerned about the particular leadership of the House. No administration measures that I can recall, certainly none of any consequence, have been rejected or sidetracked.

The article has not only for its object and purpose holding up to ridicule and contempt the Membership of this House but its real motive is a challenge to the leadership of the Speaker and majority floor leader. It was prompted and published with a view of injuring these distinguished leaders who are always fair and courteous, who never miss an opportunity to extend a helping hand or to solve a problem, or to aid a Member in obtaining relief and carrying out the wishes of his constituency. Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, our distinguished Speaker, ripe in experience, a seasoned statesman, is the "Noblest Roman of them all." He is "A man in whom the elements are so mixed that Nature might stand up and say to all the world, 'This is a man'." [Applause.]

Hon. JOE BYRNS, of Tennessee, our congenial and able majority leader, is a true southern gentleman. [Applause.] By his unassuming and unostentatious manners he has endeared himself to all with whom he comes in contact. With the stature, rugged honesty, statesmanship, and courage of an Andrew Jackson, reared and buried in his congressional district, he is a natural-born leader. [Applause.]

The article concludes:

President Roosevelt has indicated his regard for both Speaker RAINEY and Floor Leader BYRNS, and some administration adherents believe that one or both of them may be offered substantial appointive posts after the election.

We have no intention of swapping this team of wheelhorses; they work together and can always be depended upon to deliver the load in a given time at its destination. We would feel guilty of ingratitude to even entertain a swap, as well as fearing we might get a wind-broken, foundered, stringhalted, or balky team. These gentlemen will not apply for, be tendered, or accept any positions at the hands of this administration other than those which they now so well honor and fill. For over 30 years, on the floor of this House and from one end of this Nation to the other, HENRY T. RAINEY has been fighting the battles of democracy and for the greatest good to the greatest number for the people of this Nation. He has won the honor of the Speakership of this House, which he so richly deserves, and will continue to hold it. [Applause.]

For 26 years our beloved JOE BYRNS, most of the time on the Appropriations Committee, has stood as a watchdog of the Treasury and in serving as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Committee, and has contributed more than almost anyone else to the election of this Democratic House. [Applause.]

These great statesmen are men who are influenced by no impure motive, no personal aggrandizement, but who have a sole and single eye, a warm and devoted heart, devoted and dedicated to the best interests of our beloved country. I challenge anyone to obtain a statement from the President that he is not satisfied with their leadership or that he would desire to shelve them by giving them some other position. I believe I am in a position to say that there is not a syllable of truth in such a statement.

The Democratic membership of this House resents this assault. It has the effect of injuring these leaders in their races for reelection and to humiliate them in the eyes of their constituents. If there was ever any dissension or any doubt as to their popularity and reelection as leaders of the Democratic hosts of this House, that has been removed by the publication of this article.

The resentment has been such that, unsolicited, pledges have been made by such an overwhelming majority that their reelection of leadership is assured in the Seventy-fourth Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, on last Thursday during the debate on the Britten-McAndrews election contest resolution, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] addressed the House. Following his address he asked unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. That privilege was denied by the House. However, the gentleman immediately thereafter inserted several thousand words, including political vote charts and other matter, to which I have no objection; but he did invidiously and directly say a lot of unkind things about the Democratic members of that Committee on Elections No. 1, which I am sure those distinguished gentlemen would not acknowledge nor answer, but which I cannot let go by. I want to address the House a little later, and I have prepared a privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I can assure the gentleman——

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman only had 1 minute, and that has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman is not Speaker of the House. He thinks he is, but he is not.

Mr. Speaker, in the interest of those men on that side of the aisle who are too dignified and too honest——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. I ask that the resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

Mr. SABATH. I can perhaps relieve the gentleman from his feelings——

Mr. BRITTEN. I decline to yield the floor.

Mr. SABATH. But this is in the interest of orderly procedure.

Mr. BRITTEN. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The gentleman charges that I did not obtain privilege to extend my remarks.

Mr. SNELL. O Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois had the privilege——

Mr. SABATH. No, I had permission, and the RECORD shows it.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman has no right to make a point of order at the present time.

Mr. SABATH. The RECORD shows that I have obtained the privilege.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution offered by Mr. BRITTEN:

"Resolved, That—

"Whereas it appears from the publication of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Thursday, April 26, 1934, that Hon. ADOLPH J. SABATH, of Illinois, addressed the House during the consideration of House Resolution 362, reported by the Chairman of the Committee on Elections No. 1 of the House; and

"Whereas it appears on page 7459 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that day the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] requested leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD, and this request was refused by the House; and

"Whereas the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] did immediately thereafter, in violation of the rules of the House, insert in the RECORD a long extension of his remarks, including tables purporting to be the vote results in various precincts of the Ninth Congressional District of Illinois, without proof of their authenticity or accuracy; and

"Whereas the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], in this irregular and unauthorized extension of his remarks, inserted the copy of a resolution which he had intended to offer to the House, the reading of which by the Clerk had been refused by the House; and

"Whereas he did, in violation of the rules of the House, include in his irregular extension of remarks a statement that was intended to cast invidious reflection upon the Chairman of the Elections Committee No. 1, as well as upon its members:

"Resolved, That all revision and extension of remarks herein referred to and appearing on pages 7456 to 7459 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 26, 1934, without sanction of the House and in contravention of the rules of the House, be expunged from the RECORD, and the Public Printer be directed to omit them from the public records and be prohibited from issuing any copy or copies thereof in pamphlet or other form from the columns of the daily RECORD."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the point of order that the resolution does not present a matter of privilege.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the resolution states a fact which is not within the knowledge of the Chair or of the House until a check of the RECORD is made as to whether or not the gentleman did obtain unanimous consent.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I have the RECORD before me and have checked it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] was refused unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is in error.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is incorrect. On page 7498, in the first column, near the bottom of the page, is the following:

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma, Mr. SABATH—

And so forth—

asked and were given permission to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

That is the same day; and that permitted the gentleman to revise and extend those remarks.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. BYRNS. I think the gentleman should withdraw his resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a question of privilege before the House now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We cannot have two privileged questions pending at the same time.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman presented a resolution.

The SPEAKER. Let us dispose of the pending matter.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I think the gentleman should withdraw his resolution, in view of the showing in the RECORD.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my resolution and rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the resolution.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman ought to go further and apologize to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. BRITTEN. I will apologize to the gentleman a little later in the day if it appears that I should.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman, admittedly, has made a statement, undoubtedly unintentionally, which is not warranted by the RECORD. I think the gentleman should go further and apologize to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] for the injustice done him.

Mr. BRITTEN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will apologize to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] for having made a mistake in not being able to find in the RECORD that little thing that he slipped in there to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BYRNS. That is hardly fair.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, on last Thursday, during the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Elections No. 1 of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] took the floor in general debate; and after addressing the House he inserted several thousand words in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. From them I shall read excerpts which apply directly to me.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman has not stated a question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I have not completed my statement of the question of personal privilege.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman has gone far enough, that it is apparent the matter complained of involves no question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRITTEN. I hope the gentleman from New York will allow me to finish stating my question for personal privilege.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I think the gentleman has gone for enough to have made his point.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman from New York does not know how far I am going.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] inserted in the RECORD a number of deliberate misstatements about me. This constitutes a matter of personal privilege.

Mr. SABATH. What are they? Read them.

Mr. BRITTEN. I shall read them if given a little time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will read the matter of which he complains.

Mr. BRITTEN. On page 73 of the transcript and on page 7458 of the RECORD the gentleman from Illinois said:

> The recklessness and unworthiness displayed by my colleague, Mr. BRITTEN, and his lawyers, in attacking the character of the contestant is deplorable.

Then he goes on further and reminds readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that Mr. McAndrews who was my opponent in the last election and who will be my opponent in the next election—

> Resided for many years in that district, and in fact he has spent more time therein than has my colleague, the contestee.

That is one point.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that statement is not a reflection on a Member of Congress and does not give rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRITTEN. If the gentleman will desist for one moment and let me conclude I will make a point of personal privilege.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman is just trying to put this in the RECORD under the claim of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is one of them.

On page 73 of the transcript, page 7458 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the gentleman stated that—

> Long before my colleague, Mr. BRITTEN, or I reached the city of Chicago, Mr. McAndrews was favorably known to a majority of the people of that district.

Both of these statements are deliberate misstatements. I was born in Chicago 62 years ago.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the gentleman making a speech.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois has a right to make his statement on the question of personal privilege without a point of order being raised; then when his statement is concluded the gentleman from New York may make his point of order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. No, Mr. Speaker; I make the point of order that the gentleman has stated enough.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I cannot be taken off my feet by the gentleman from New York while I am presenting my case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman has just made a speech, which he cannot do under the rules.

Mr. BRITTEN. If the gentleman from New York will sit down a minute I shall appreciate it very much. Some day I will do as much for him.

On page 73 of the transcript, page 7458 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] inserted this language:

> The charge made by the contestee—

That is myself—

> against the county judge and the election board, before the elections committee, was willful and malicious.

Mr. Speaker, every member of the Elections Committee will verify the fact that I have repeatedly eulogized this distinguished Democratic judge of Chicago.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the gentleman is proceeding as if he had been granted the right to be heard on a question of personal privilege. I make the point of order that the gentleman should state the language about which he complains, and not make a speech.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BRITTEN. I cannot understand how the distinguished leader on the other side can assume this attitude, after all the nice things that have just been said about him.

On page 74–C of the transcript, page 7458 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] states that he was treated in a most unfriendly manner by the Chairman of the Committee on Elections in connection with my case.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I have not concluded my case on the question of personal privilege. I will in a moment.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has just read something which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] is alleged to have said about the Chairman of the Elections Committee. He cannot rise to a question of personal privilege on what was stated about the chairman of that committee.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, may I proceed further?

On page 7458 of the RECORD there was inserted language which is defamatory in its character and which reflects upon every Member of this House.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman cannot rise to a question of personal privilege of every Member of the House. We will take care of ourselves. Let the gentleman from Illinois take care of himself.

Mr. BRITTEN. I do not think the gentleman is able to take care of himself, and I am going to do it for him.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] made this statement:

> In conclusion, I cannot refrain from stating that this arbitrary action, as well as the action of the gentlemen of the Elections Committee who first moved that the ballots be recounted and who some weeks later moved to rescind the action of the committee, is hard for me to comprehend. There is a great deal more that I could say which I shall refrain from saying at this time; but when the opportunity presents itself I will name the Members and some non-Members of this House who may be responsible for the reconsideration of the first action of the committee and for its refusal of the recount.

Mr. Speaker, that is a direct reflection and a direct imputation. He is pointing his finger at these gentlemen and me.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman cannot make a speech.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I am rising to the question of personal privilege, and I am trying to show why I should be entitled to the floor. If the gentleman will allow me to proceed, I will conclude my statement and not take up much time of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] cannot say anything except quote from the RECORD the language to which he takes exception.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed to state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, the parts which I have read are an insult to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will not argue the matter.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, that is the point of my question of personal privilege. No Member of the House may insult another Member by an insertion of matter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will not argue. All the Chair desires to know is the language to which the gentleman takes exception.

Mr. BRITTEN. I have read the language, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] has read the following language from a speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] inserted in the RECORD under a leave to revise and extend his remarks:

In view of that fact and the manly position assumed by contestant, Mr. McAndrews, the recklessness and unworthiness displayed by my colleague, Mr. BRITTEN, and his lawyers in attacking the character of the contestant is deplorable.

And again:

The charge made by the contestee against the county judge and the election board before the Elections Committee was willful and malicious.

The Chair thinks that the language which has just been read comes within the rule and that it affects the dignity and reputation of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN]. The gentleman is recognized on his question of personal privilege.

As to the other matter the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] read, the Chair holds that it does not constitute a question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I realize the House desires to proceed with the stock exchange bill, and I am not going to take up any more time than is absolutely necessary. However, because of the insinuations and the innuendoes and threats that have been made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], not necessarily against me but against a distinguished group of lawyers on that side of the aisle who are members of this Elections Committee and who have refused to be a party to the theft of a seat in the House, and who said so when they took the floor of the House here—I think in justice to them it is wrong to allow language such as has been inserted in the RECORD by the gentleman from Illinois to remain there.

This is my sole purpose in rising. The language was inserted in the RECORD because my opponent in the coming election this year is the same man who was my opponent a year and a half ago, and this language—oh, I could call it a number of names if I were on the stump—was inserted in the RECORD by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] without a chance given to anyone to reply to it in the RECORD, and was inserted for the sole purpose of doing what was done 2 years ago in sending into my district under the gentleman's frank a lot of stuff attacking me. This was done 2 years ago. The gentleman has not the slightest conception of congressional courtesy.

Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. O'CONNOR, and Mr. BYRNS rose.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I shall withdraw that remark. I want the gentleman to know I am going to be very dignified about this matter.

Let me now take up some of these remarks. The gentleman, for instance, indicates I said something willful and malicious about the Democratic county judge, Hon. Edmund K. Jarecki. There are at least five or six gentlemen on the floor of the House at this moment to whom I have expressed my very highest regard for, and opinion of, Judge Jarecki. He has been the Democratic county judge for years, more or less dominating all of the election machinery in Chicago, and he is one of the outstanding and one of the highest type judges in the United States. I have repeatedly said this, but the gentleman, under his permission to revise and extend his remarks, could only have had one purpose in saying that I attacked the county judge, which was to make him feel unkindly toward me before the election next year. But even this, no matter what I may have said about the county judge, or anybody else may have said to the detriment of the character of the county judge, would not sway his honest decisions one iota. He is that type of man, and I know it.

The gentleman says I talked about the board of election commissioners in a way to put them in a bad light. They are also Democrats, and I have spoken in the very highest terms of them. Their honesty of purpose is unimpeachable, but, of course, they are still the election commissioners and will be next year when the election is on, and this insertion in the RECORD was made to hurt my character with them. I think it is mighty small and mighty cheap politics.

Let me go a little further, Mr. Speaker. I never attacked, as the gentleman indicates in his remarks, the character of James McAndrews, my opponent. On the contrary I have said a lot of nice things about him. He was a Member of Congress here for six terms from a district about 10 miles from the one in which I now live and in which he now lives. I did say he never made a speech during the last campaign, and he never did. This is no slander. It is a part of the record that he never did. There is no slander in this, and he probably will not make one in the next election, either, for reasons best known to himself.

The gentleman also says:

Long before my colleague, Mr. BRITTEN, or I reached the city of Chicago, Mr. McAndrews was favorably known to a majority of the people of that district.

Long before the gentleman or I reached Chicago McAndrews was popularly known in my district. This was before the Chicago fire in 1871, when I was born—think of it! The gentleman knows I was born in Chicago 62 years ago, but long before that time McAndrews was very popular in my district. [Laughter.]

I have made some inquiries about his popularity at that time, but it was said that the Chicago fire of 1871 burned all the records, and therefore we cannot find anything about this boy wonder. [Laughter.] The gentleman, of course, was not here at the time of the Chicago fire. He was in Czechoslovakia.

Mr. SABATH. That is right.

Mr. TERRY of Arkansas. May I ask the gentleman a question? The gentleman spoke about having been born at the time of the fire. I have always wondered what started that great conflagration in Chicago. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRITTEN. I may say to the gentleman that I came after the fire, and that is probably the reason I get hot every once in a while.

The gentleman [Mr. SABATH] also states, on page 7458, in a number of charts and tables which he inserted, and which, by the way, only show the Republican vote and do not show the Democratic vote at all, and were merely intended to confuse——

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. All the matter which was held a question of personal privilege is on page 7458, left-hand column, consisting of two sentences.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, does that mean I cannot go into the other points that reflect on my character?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must confine himself to the objectionable language referred to.

Mr. BRITTEN. Of course, I know the Speaker will hold I cannot do anything that is not pertinent to the Speaker's ruling.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to justify himself with respect to the charges made against him.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman refers to the vote in every precinct and in every one of the wards, and, of course, is referring to the vote by which I was elected, but he only shows the Republican vote. The gentleman does not show the Democratic vote at all, and confusion, of course, will arise in the mind of anyone looking at these charts alone. They will lead them to think I got a tremendous vote in that district. The truth of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, out of 4 wards in my district I carried 2 and lost 2, and I did not carry any of them in a lopsided manner or by an excessive vote, despite what these charts show.

For instance, if he had included alongside of my vote the vote for Mr. McAndrews, he would have shown not 22 percent in the forty-second ward——

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is traveling outside of the language mentioned by the Speaker.

Mr. BRITTEN. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] inserted certain charts and tables——

The SPEAKER. That is not in issue.

Mr. BRITTEN. It was in issue in Chicago a year and a half ago. Do I understand the Speaker definitely rules that this language is not of a personal character, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] says in his extension?—

In conclusion, I cannot refrain from stating that this arbitrary action, as well as the action of the gentleman of the elections committee, who first moved that the ballots be recounted and who some weeks later moved to rescind the action of the committee, is hard for me to comprehend.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the Speaker has ruled against that language as being privileged.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BRITTEN. Where the gentleman from Illinois threatens the Members of the House because of the presentation of the election committee resolution, does not the Speaker feel that I am entitled to take the floor in that direction?

The SPEAKER. Not on that.

Mr. BRITTEN. Then I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] also desires some time, and I will couple that request with that of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. If the gentleman from Illinois will speak the English language so we can understand him, we will go along with him.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I object to that—the gentleman has already referred to Czechoslovakia.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is a direct insult to the House.

Mr. BRITTEN. If my friend from Massachusetts says so, I will take that out of the RECORD.

Mr. McCORMACK. I consider it an insult to the Members of the House.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, my good friend from Massachusetts indicates that that language should come out of the RECORD, and I promise the House that I will take it out of the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that I may take that out of my speech.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I object.

THE QUESTION OF RIVERS, HARBORS, AND FLOODS

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an address that I delivered before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me today before the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, which is holding its twenty-ninth annual convention in the city of Washington, D.C.:

The rivers and harbors of the country present national questions. A national policy is more important now than ever before to insure the continued improvement, development, and utilization of a national waterway transportation system, including rivers, harbors, lakes, canals, and connecting waterways. The program can best be supported with the national viewpoint in mind. The improvement should be well balanced and the public interests of the whole country must be considered.

Transportation is essential to the progress of any people. Water transportation has always contributed to making cities and countries great and powerful.

The great cities of modern and ancient times have been located on rivers, gulfs, seas, or oceans. New York is situated at the mouth of the Hudson and New Orleans is located near the mouth of the Mississippi.

History shows that the controlling influence in the rise and fall of cities and nations has been the relative costs of transportation. The life of all countries is characterized by the bloodless yet relentless warfare of trade and commerce.

The United States has unsurpassed inland and coastal waterways. With the greatest valleys and the most fertile plains in the world, surrounded by lakes, gulf, and oceans, and with the mightiest river system on earth traversing the interior valleys and plains, its facilities for both domestic and foreign commerce are unrivaled among the nations. Commerce makes and keeps a nation great. Agriculture and manufacturing are capable of greater expansion in the United States than in any other country. It is imperative that the United States assume and maintain its leadership in trade and commerce, domestic and foreign. Cheap transportation is necessary to the advancement of both agriculture and industry. The maintenance of an adequate merchant marine is essential to the development of foreign commerce and imperative as a matter of national defense. The development of inland and coastal waterways and the promotion of domestic waterway transportation are equally important to domestic commerce.

The coastline of the United States, including the shore line on the Great Lakes, aggregates some 45,000 miles—almost twice the circumference of the earth. The rivers in number and length, in both navigation and power are unsurpassed.

ONE HUNDRED YEARS

From the first, the improvement of waterways was advocated as a part of the internal-improvement policy of the Nation. Washington and Jefferson were among the first advocates of inland waterways and harbor improvements. Federal appropriations for river and harbor improvements were begun more than 100 years ago. They were made more effective by the act of June 13, 1902, creating the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors. The best way to foster and maintain a national policy is to advocate only the projects that are sound from both an engineering and economic standpoint.

The first congressional appropriation for improving rivers and harbors was made in 1824. It was the era of canal building, to be followed by the turnpike. It was the beginning of railway construction; it was the time of Fulton, Stephenson, Livingston, and Macadam.

The history of transportation is the story of canals, waterways, roads, railways, highways, pipe lines, and airways. The stagecoach has been replaced by the motor bus; the sailboat has been superseded by the steamboat, and now by the steel barge. The primitive locomotive with its wood burner has been replaced by the modern giant coal-and-oil burner. Progress means change. In no other field have more transitions occurred than in the realm of transportation.

The inland waterways have had a contest from the beginning. The early canals were acquired by the railroads and junked. Steamboats were purchased and scrapped. Cutthroat rates were inaugurated by the railroads and traffic on the Mississippi River practically disappeared by 1900. Having obtained a monopoly, the railroads increased rates.

PANAMA CANAL

The construction of the Panama Canal resulted in favoring industries near the coast to the detriment of manufacturing in the interior. It diverted traffic from the transcontinental railways to steamships. The Middle West was penalized. Rates from Kansas City to San Francisco are in excess of the rates on first-class freight from New York to San Francisco. Between the Rocky and the Appalachian Mountains, 70 percent of the agricultural products of the United States are produced, 50 percent of its manufactured products are supplied and 60 percent of its exportable surplus of agricultural products are grown. This vast area contains 98 percent of the iron-ore deposits, 82 percent of the coal, and 70 percent of the petroleum stores of the country. The raw material is available in abundance and with an outlet to the sea, the Mississippi Valley will become in deed and in truth the heart of the Nation. The people of the interior must have access to the ocean and to world markets. Cheap transportation is imperative.

COMPARATIVE RATES

Transportation is measured by freight rates in mills per ton-mile. In 1924 the average freight rate of the railroads was 11.32 mills per ton-mile. The average rate on the Great Lakes was 1.2 mills per ton-mile. From 1923 to 1928 the average rate of the Inland Waterways Corporation between New Orleans, La., and St. Louis, Mo., was 3.9 mills per ton-mile. The figures speak for themselves. Water transportation is the cheapest form of transportation. The Great Lakes provide the cheapest transportation in the world.

INVESTMENT

The total expenditures of the Government to June 30, 1932, for waterways aggregated $1,650,000,000, approximately a billion dollars having been spent for river and harbor construction, a quarter of a billion dollars for their maintenance, and a quarter of a billion dollars for flood control and navigation on the Mississippi and Sacramento Rivers. Great harbors have been constructed at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Houston, Galveston, San Francisco, Los Angeles, and at Cleveland and other points on the Great Lakes.

The prosperity of the Nation depends upon the prosperity of all parts of the country. If one section suffers at the expense of another, the whole Nation suffers.

The economic balance in the great Middle West can only be restored by cheap river transportation in cooperation with rail and motor transportation.

SUBSIDIES

Transportation is probably the best barometer of trade. If commerce declines, transportation feels the effects first—competition becomes keen. When freight decreases, competition increases. Rate wars result. At the present time a campaign is being waged against the Inland Waterways Corporation. Much is being said about subsidies to inland waterways.

All forms of transportation, with the exception of pipe lines, have at one time or another been subsidized. More than 200,000,000 acres of land were granted by the Government to the railroads. Many of the lands have been sold. They netted the railroads $374,411,176.39. It is estimated that the lands still owned by the railroads are valued at $387,970,275.82. I am not criticizing these grants. Cash donations, land subsidies, and stock subscriptions were made to railroads amounting to approximately $915,000,000. The Government actually subsidized the railroads for the 26 months of operation during the World War, and the 6-month guaranty period after the war in an aggregate amount far greater than the total sums appropriated for inland waterways since the beginning of the Government.

In opposing the legitimate operations of the Inland Waterways Corporation ostensibly to get the Government out of business but in reality to destroy water transportation, the railroads are pursuing a short-sighted policy. A campaign has been waged among railway employees. They have been beguiled by propaganda. They have been told that 195,000 railway employees have been thrown out of employment by the operations of the Federal Barge Lines. If this argument were sound, it would constitute an indictment of railway operation. Is it possible for the Federal Barge Lines, employing only 6,500 men, to do the equivalent work of 195,000 railway employees?

Again, the railways of the United States are the direct beneficiaries of 90 percent of the river and harbor appropriations. They are quite content for the Government to improve harbors at Portland, San Francisco, Galveston, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston for the accommodation of the railroads. They have been among the chief advocates of the improvement of the ports of the Great Lakes. They have been the beneficiaries of these improvements. Until the people of the Mississippi Valley are accorded the equivalent of the freight rates that obtain along the seaboard, railway opposition to improving the inland waterways will fall of its own weight.

Whenever any form of transportation fails to serve the public, that form of transportation must either readjust itself or fail. I am the friend of railways. They are entitled to a square deal, but railways must meet competition or, having fulfilled their mission, the railways will fail. Moreover, when the business of the country recovers there will be sufficient traffic for all. It is said that transportation doubles ever 15 years. The solution is more traffic and hence more earnings. If railways will reduce instead of increase their freight rates, and if they will reduce their passenger rates, there will be more traffic and more income. Nothing will so quickly destroy a city or a country as excessive transportation costs.

INLAND WATERWAYS CORPORATION

The Inland Waterways Corporation was organized in 1924 under the Transportation Act of 1920 to increase and expand water carriers and rail carriers through cooperation so that there might be a coordinated and cooperative rail-water transportation system. The act was designed to encourage a water transportation and to foster and preserve in full vigor both rail and water transportation.

Every citizen of the United States is interested in the costs of transportation. It is reflected in the costs of living.

The argument against Government subsidy is the same argument that has been advanced by every transportation agency that was superseded and supplanted by those in existence today.

The United States will not abandon its investments in rivers and harbors, but it will maintain and complete the system and thus promote the interests of the public, which are paramount to the interests of any private or public industry. Public service rather than private profit is the slogan that should characterize the policy that will result in the maintenance and improvement of the waterways of the Nation.

The utilization of the Mississippi River and its navigable tributaries will benefit rather than injure the railroads. The Monongahela River in the Pittsburgh area carries 26,000,000 tons annually and yet the Pennsylvania Railroad has enlarged its Monongahela division four times. Manufacturers make great industrial centers and cheap raw materials are vital. The cost of transportation determines the location of industries.

The great aluminum plant at East St. Louis would not have been established without the cheap cost of transporting bauxite ore from the British Guianas by ship and thence up the Mississippi River by the Federal Barge Lines. All railroads that connect with East St. Louis profit by distributing the finished product. There should be cooperation rather than conflict between the waterways and the railways.

The Inland Waterways Corporation is fulfilling its mission. Traffic is returning to the Mississippi River. The tonnage on the Mississippi today is twice what it was in the halcyon days of the palatial steamboats. The Inland Waterways Corporation carries annually about 1,700,000 tons of freight. In 1929, before the depression, it carried 2,114,470 tons of freight.

Water transportation is dependent upon navigable streams, suitable boats, adequate terminals, balanced freight, cooperation with the railroads and an equitable division of the freight rates. The economic salvation of the Mississippi Valley depends upon cheaper transportation rates, especially of raw materials and bulky commodities. The cities have cooperated. Minneapolis, St. Paul, St. Louis, East St. Louis, Cairo, Memphis, Helena, Vicksburg, Baton Rouge, New Orleans, Dubuque, Burlington, and Rock Island have erected terminals. The city of Greenville, Miss., has recently erected a terminal.

The Mississippi River is open to navigation from Chicago and St. Paul to New Orleans. Navigation on the Missouri to Kansas City will shortly be accomplished. Navigation along the Ohio River has enabled cheaper freight rates from Pittsburgh to New Orleans than obtain by rail from Pittsburgh to Baltimore although the distance to New Orleans is more than five times greater.

DEFINITE POLICY

Improvements for rivers and harbors are under attack. These attacks have been accentuated by economic conditions that have resulted in freight decreases. The opponents of Federal appropriations for rivers and harbors urge a change in governmental policy. In opposition to Federal appropriations for the construction and improvement of Federal works, it is urged that the United States abandon the policy of Federal appropriations that has heretofore obtained. It is now urged that improvements should be made by direct charges against the traffic. The policy that obtains along the Rhine and other European streams is being advocated as applicable to the United States; but our situation is vastly different. European conditions are not applicable here. A tax upon vessels and a lockage tax in our canalized streams would not suffice. They would hinder rather than help. The Rhine is an international stream—France, Germany, Holland, and Belgium are all interested. Most of the other large rivers in Europe are international streams. This is especially true of the Danube. Again, European streams are not comparable to the Mississippi and its tributaries. They are much smaller.

Our inland waterways are located entirely within the United States. They are in most cases interstate streams. There is no occasion to follow the European policy. All of the people interested are in the United States. No international problems are involved. It is a mistake merely to try something because it is new. European conditions, I repeat, are not applicable. The United States makes, instead of follows, precedents. With the largest inland waterways in the world and with the greatest resources on earth, the Federal Government should continue to promote the improvement of its rivers and harbors as a Federal problem, and at Federal expense. It will be more economical to improve our waterways year by year than to double either our highways or our railways. The remedy is not to abandon the American policy, but to preserve and expand that policy for the benefit of all worth-while rivers and harbors in the country.

FLOOD CONTROL

Closely allied with the problem of transportation is the question of flood control. Floods are the destructive enemies of transportation as they are of life and property. Sooner or later the losses of floods are absorbed by the Nation. With the building of cities, with the improvement of the country, and with the increase in population, the hazard of floods is becoming increasingly greater. Flood control along navigable streams is the proper function of the Federal Government. Congress has the power to regulate both foreign and domestic commerce. The power to regulate commerce includes the power to enact flood-control legislation in order to protect commerce and preserve life.

The problem of controlling floods as distinguished from the navigation of the stream in the case of the Mississippi River is not adaptable to local treatment. Minor local flood conditions may be handled by the local authorities, but general flood problems are beyond the capacity of the local interests to solve. Levees along the Mississippi River must hold waters that come from points as far east as Pittsburgh and as far west as Idaho and from all of the territory between the Alleghenies and the Rockies. The working of a suitable plan of control for the Mississippi and its tributaries is a problem of immense complexity. The problem can be solved by improving and increasing the channel capacity, by confining the flood waters between levees, by the construction of reservoirs, and by diversions. No one method alone is capable of solving the flood problems of the Mississippi River and its tributaries. A comprehensive plan will involve a combination of all the methods available.

The Mississippi flood of 1927 drove 700,000 people from their homes, resulted in the loss of at least 246 lives, and destroyed property and property values aggregating $200,000,000 to $400,000,000. The American public contributed for the relief of this disaster some $18,000,000. It was, in the language of Herbert Hoover, "Our greatest peace-time disaster."

There was a destructive flood in the Miami Valley in 1913, as a result of which 300 lives were lost with property damages of $100,000,000.

Prior to 1917 no Federal appropriations had been made for flood control. The appropriations were made for the Mississippi River, with the limitation they should be used only in aid of navigation. The Flood Control Act of 1917 for the first time gave recognition to the problem of floods, and provided for a partial contribution to improvements to prevent floods along the Mississippi River and along the Sacramento River, but it was not until the great Mississippi flood of 1927 that flood control on the Mississippi was adopted as a national policy. Previously the question had been how much the building of a reservoir or the construction of a levee would affect navigation.

There has been a change of consciousness. The Mississippi River and its tributaries are the property of the people of the United States. The system embraces 42 percent of the area of the United States and touches 31 of the 48 States of the Union. It constitutes a problem for national control.

The Flood Control Act of 1928 authorizing the appropriation of $325,000,000 is fundamentally sound. It provides that levees along the main river should be supplemented by diversions, floodways, outlets, and spillways. It is intended to solve the problem in the lower Mississippi Valley from Cairo to the Gulf of Mexico, but the Nation will never be satisfied until adequate provision has been made for the solution of the problem along the entire river and its tributaries.

There are two problems in the Mississippi Valley: First, there must be relief from floods; secondly, there must be the creation and utilization of navigation to give the farms and the mines an outlet to the sea. The flood problems of the Mississippi River will never be solved until the problems along the tributaries have been solved.

For the past 15 years the Federal Government has contributed to the improvement of both flood control and navigation of the Sacramento River. Navigation obtains to a large extent, especially along the lower stretches of the Sacramento River.

The construction of Boulder Dam will provide for flood control along the lower Colorado in the Imperial Valley.

The improvements under the supervision of the Tennessee Valley Authority will result in flood control along the Tennessee River. The Public Works Administration in 1933 authorized the construction of the Bonneville Dam and the Grand Coulee Reservoir on the Columbia River and provided for the building of the Fort Peck Reservoir along the Missouri River. In aid of navigation, the Public Works authorized the construction of a reservoir on the Tygart River, a tributary of the Monongahela River. It approved and agreed to pay approximately one half the cost of the building of a system of reservoirs along the Muskingum River in Ohio. These projects are being executed under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, except the Grand Coulee Reservoir, which is under the supervision of the Bureau of Reclamation. Some 4 years ago Congress appropriated money to provide against floods in Lake Okeechobee, Fla., as a part of the improvement of the intercoastal waterways of the Nation.

I have thus enumerated the flood-control projects of the Nation to which the Federal Government has contributed.

Probably the outstanding flood-control project constructed without Federal contribution is the Miami conservancy project along the Miami Valley in Ohio, built following the flood of 1913 at a cost of $30,000,000. It consists of a series of retarding dams and reservoirs and has protected the Miami Valley from overflow.

WATERWAYS EXPERIMENT STATION

For years John R. Freeman, the eminent civilian engineer, had advocated the establishment of a national hydraulic laboratory. One of the most constructive features of the Flood Control Act of 1928 was the provision for the United States Waterways Experiment Station, which is located at Vicksburg, Miss. The initial cost of the hydraulic laboratory was approximately a quarter of a million dollars. Without question it is the most complete hydraulic laboratory in the world. Already river and harbor works, as well as flood-control improvements are profiting as a result of experimentation. From time immemorial cut-offs were opposed by Mississippi River engineers. It was argued that they would destroy the channel below the cut-off and that they were wholly detrimental in alluvial valleys. Experiments thus far conducted indicate a complete change of view with respect to cut-offs. The experiments to date have been highly satisfactory, but, as usual, the Corps of Engineers are careful and conservative. There have been no large Mississippi floods since the experiments have been made. While optimistic, the Corps of Engineers await the testing of the experiments by actual floods. It is believed, however, that flood heights can and will be materially reduced by cut-offs that are being made in the vicinity of Greenville, Vicksburg, and Natchez on the lower Mississippi River.

The laboratory is being used for experiments in all river and harbor work. It will materially contribute to the solution of the problems of both navigation and flood control.

RESERVOIRS

Further and careful studies in flood control are demonstrating that reservoirs will largely be utilized in the control of the floods of the tributaries of the Mississippi River. While reservoirs located near the alluvial valley will be most effective in controlling the floods of the lower Mississippi River, there is a definite place for reservoirs in the upper stretches of the tributaries. The adopted project in the Mississippi Flood Control Act of 1928 is sound because it is capable of expansion. No work that is done under the act will be discarded or become obsolete as a result of the controlling of floods along the tributaries. It is capable of expansion to provide for flood protection in the backwater and the tributary areas. The same obligation rests upon the Government to protect the backwater areas that obtain along the Mississippi River.

SURVEYS AND EXAMINATIONS

Drainage and minor flood-control works along the streams and rivers of the United States have been constructed at immense costs to the taxpayers of the Nation. In many cases they were utterly inadequate. There had been no surveys of the rivers and streams along which they were constructed. In line with its policy of promoting the public interest in the Rivers and Harbors Act of January 21, 1927, provision was made for studies of approximately 200 streams and rivers in the United States, as provided by House Docket 308, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session.

On these streams, the Corps of Engineers were directed to formulate plans for the improvement of the streams for navigation, for flood control, irrigation, and hydroelectric power, and $7,322,400 was authorized to be appropriated for the surveys and examinations. Under section 10 of the Flood Control Act of May 15, 1928, the Corps of Engineers were especially directed to submit reports, as provided by said document 308, but with more comprehensive surveys and investigations, covering the main tributaries of the Mississippi River, including the Yazoo River in Mississippi. The report on the Yazoo River has been submitted and will be published in the near future. It will recommend the control of the floods along the Yazoo River system by the construction of a series of reservoirs near the foothills and will recommend the control of the floods in the backwater area by the building of a system of levees.

NATIONAL PLAN FOR FLOOD CONTROL

We hear much of national planning these days. National plans for flood control are now under consideration. An agency has been suggested for the supervision of further flood-control works along the Mississippi River, another agency for the east tributaries, and a third agency for the west tributaries of the main river. Agencies dealing with flood control in other rivers emptying into the Gulf and agencies for the rivers that find their way into the Lakes, and into the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, have been suggested.

We are likely to become topheavy with commissions. Too many executives result in inefficiency. The problems of rivers are similar.

The Corps of Engineers of the United States have had more experience and are better informed about flood-control problems than any other engineers in the world. They have been loyal and efficient. The Fort Peck improvement, the Muskingum project, and the Columbia River Dam, as I have stated, are being constructed under their supervision. They have advised the Administrator of Public Works respecting all flood-control and river-and-harbor improvements.

I advocate a policy of national flood control. The Mississippi River is the longest and the most important river in the world. The Mississippi Valley as a dwelling place for mankind is the most important territory on the globe. The plan along this river should embrace all its tributaries and should provide for floods along all of the tributaries.

What agency shall represent the public and the Government in the formulation and expansion of the plans for the further improvement of the Mississippi River system? The Corps of Engineers are familiar with all of the rivers of the Nation. They have studied them. They have examined them. The engineers of the Army are composed of the ablest engineers in the United States. The honor graduates of West Point have the privilege of an assignment in the Corps of Engineers. Graduates are sent to the leading engineering schools in the United States and foreign countries. Army engineers are thus among the best-educated and best-trained engineers in the world.

I believe that there should be a comprehensive plan for the Mississippi River system and that it should be under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers. I recommend the same course for the other rivers of the United States. In both planning and execution there must be an executive who has the final say. The Chief of Engineers should be at the head of both planning and execution. A division engineer may be immediately in charge of the Mississippi River system and other division engineers in charge of the systems in the other watersheds of the Nation, but in the interest of economy and efficiency and for the public good of the people of the United States I believe that the formulation and execution of policies should be under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, with the power and authority in him to utilize, in connection with the Army engineers, the best engineering talent among the civilian engineers of the country.

APPROPRIATIONS

The Congress of the United States levies taxes. The Congress should, therefore, provide for definite appropriations. In an emergency and to promote employment the prerogative may be delegated to another authority. Practically all public works in the United States have been investigated through the years by the Congress of the United States. Investigation by an independent agency in many cases results in duplication and in other cases in works that Congress has refused to approve.

If Congress is to levy the taxes, Congress should be the spokesman in the appropriations and allocations of funds for flood control and river-and-harbor improvements. I repeat, however, to emphasize, that the public interest in all projects must be apparent and that the projects must be sound. I have, therefore, urged that Congress resume its function of making direct appropriations for public improvements, including highways, rivers and harbors and flood-control works. The first step has been taken. Congress, for the fiscal year 1935, has definitely allocated and appropriated $29,000,000 for flood control and has made provision for the release of an additional $18,000,000 previously impounded by Executive order. There is thus available so that works may be planned and executed during the favorable seasons and weather, approximately $47,000,000 for new work and maintenance in the year 1935. I advocate a similar policy for highways and for river-and-harbor work.

As an advocate of the improvement of the rivers of the Nation for navigation and flood control, I maintain that no transportation will survive as long as some other form furnishes a cheaper and a better mode of transportation. I assert that this better and cheaper transportation will result through cooperation and coordination of waterways, highways, and railways.

The people of the Mississippi Valley are not selfish. They are interested in the progress of the people of all of the States of the Union. Whatever helps us will help others. We can only prosper as others prosper. We are all citizens of a common country, with a common destiny.

The United States has erected an imposing structure at Yorktown to commemorate the birth of the independence of the Nation. I believe that the sentiment of the words carved on that monument should characterize all of our plans and purposes for the improvement and advancement of the rivers and harbors of the United States. On that noble shaft are these words:

"One country—one constitution—one destiny."

AMENDING LONGSHOREMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT

Mr. O'CONNOR, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 366 (Report No. 1395)

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 8057, a bill to amend the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act with respect to rates of compensation, and for other purposes. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

SECURITIES EXCHANGE BILL OF 1934

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 363, for the consideration of the bill H.R. 9323, and ask that it be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 363

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 9323, a bill to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 4 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the word "four" and insert the word "seven."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the usual 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY], if he desires to use that much time. I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I am so very much interested in this rule and the proposed legislation that I shall refrain from answering my colleague from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], but I shall do so in the near future and point out to him that no injustice was done him by my extension of remarks and the statistics included in my speech, which do not descend to the regrettable depths of unfairness and viciousness he has displayed toward me.

Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, the resolution before us is broad and liberal. It calls for 7 hours of general debate.

After that, notwithstanding the bill is of a very technical nature, the rule provides that the bill shall be read under the 5-minute rule giving each and every Member opportunity to offer amendments and to speak on the amendments.

I am of opinion that this is the most important piece of legislation that has even been considered by the Congress. For many years efforts have been made to regulate the stock exchanges. After every panic serious efforts have been made to enact legislation that would make impossible the panics that were brought about by the manipulation of the stock exchange. In 1894, after the 1893 panic, an effort was made to secure legislation. In 1908 a commission was appointed to investigate the stock exchange, and in 1912 a bill was introduced to accomplish that purpose. The Pujo Committee reported and demanded action in 1912. The bill was considered, but the same tactics that are pursued against this bill were utilized then to bring about the defeat or delay of the legislation.

During the last 30 days I have received, and each and every Member must have received, hundreds of letters and telegrams from misled business men telling us that this legislation will be detrimental to the best interests of the Nation. I say to these business men that they are misled. This legislation will restore confidence, will not injure legitimate business, and all it will do is restrict the gambling activities of a small group of men who have no interest in the welfare of the Nation, but who, regardless of the effect everybody knew it would have upon conditions of the country, ruthlessly manipulated the markets and brought about the conditions from which the Nation is now suffering. Had it not been for the manipulators of Wall Street, for the criminal inflation for which they were responsible and carried on in 1927, 1928, and 1929, the crash would not have occurred. The people who were responsible for the inflation of 1928 and 1929 are also the very men responsible for the crash in 1929. This legislation is absolutely necessary for the best interests of the Nation, because not until we pass this measure will confidence be restored. All this bill aims to do is to prohibit the reckless gambling and manipulation on the exchange.

I have here from an inside man a description of the stock exchange. He says:

1. Not one fourth of the transactions on the exchange are sales where the seller actually parts with the security, and is paid for it by the purchaser.
2. The exchange is, therefore, the largest gambling house in the world.
3. This gambling house is owned and controlled by its broker members.
4. The value of a seat on the exchange, depends upon the amount of play the game attracts.
5. Those who run the game are really the betting commissioners for the boobs who sit in the game.
6. The betting commissioners have looked in the hand of every one of the "boobs", know exactly what cards they hold, and the limit of their stakes.
7. Most important of all, they know at just what point the "boob" has put in a stop-loss order, hence they know just when the "boob" must take his loss, when the market is forced down.

The privilege of a seat at the gambling table in New York was worth as much as $650,000 at one time. True, it is not worth that much today, but that was the price in the good old days of 1929. No wonder that every ingenuity and every effort is being made to mislead the House and the Membership about this legislation now pending.

I regret that the propaganda going on is so unfair and unjustifiable. As I stated before, they are trying in every conceivable way to mislead the Members and the country in regard to the legislation. I myself am indeed grateful and overjoyed that I have the opportunity to speak for the rule that will make the legislation in order, because ever since 1929 I have appealed to the stock-exchange officials and I appealed to the then President, Mr. Hoover, urging that we suspend these operations. I have pleaded that they should stop short-selling and the many vicious activities that were detrimental to the Nation, but nothing has been done. They now say, "Give us a chance and we will amend our rules." They have refused to act before, and they will refuse to act in the future.

Regardless of what they promise, regardless of what they say, they are not sincere, they do not want any legislation, they believe that it is their own privilege and their God-given right to control this gambling den that brought about destruction to America, brought about the closing of our banks and manufacturing plants, nearly ruined all of the insurance companies, brought about the unemployment of 16,000,000 men in the United States and that caused untold hardships and suffering and, above all, that was responsible for thousands of suicidal deaths. I doubt very much that any flood, fire, or plague ever caused as much destruction and loss as the inflations of 1928 and 1929 and its resultant crash. In fact, it destroyed the values of not only stocks and bonds, but the value of city and farm properties, as statistics show that the value of listed stocks fell to the extent of 83 percent, causing a loss of more than $100,000,000,000. I say that had we had legislation of this nature on our statute books in 1893, 1907, and 1929 the then panics and losses would not have been possible. Therefore, I am amazed that so many well-meaning business men permit themselves to be used by the most vicious propagandists in the history of America. To the business men of America I want to say they should not be alarmed by this proposed legislation. Instead of stifling business it will encourage business and restore confidence. I invite them to read the financial reports of even the Republican newspapers. A heading on the first page of the financial section of a Chicago newspaper of April 26 reads:

General Motors Quarter Net Soars to 63 Cents—Profit is 500 Percent Over Same 1933 Period.

Another heading in the same paper:

Power Output Reaches Best Level of Year.

Still another:

Steel Activity Continues Rise to 56 Percent—Operations Gain Four Points for Week.

Another:

White Motor Gives Third 10-Percent Raise to Workers.

On the same page:

Dollar Rises Above Par to 59.11 Gold Cents.

Another reads:

Stewart-Warner Profit is $167,495 in First Quarter.

Still another on the same page:

Industrial Earnings Run Three Times Those Year Ago.

A further heading reads:

The First 51 Corporations to Report Show Total Net of $18,740,000, as Compared With $6,332,000 a Year Ago.

Other headings:

Sangamo Electric Boosts Pay 10 Percent; 700 Affected—New Car, Store Sales, Rise in Chicago Area.

From a New York newspaper of April 27 the following heading appears in its financial section:

Bank Reserves up $79,000,000 in Week.

And another from this New York paper:

Internal Revenue Shows Big Increase—9 Months' Total to March 31 Was $797,000,000 Above That of 1932-33 Period.

From a Washington newspaper of April 28:

Electric Output Reveals Uptrend—North American Official Reports Gain in April of Over 18 Percent.

Mr. Speaker, such are the headings in these Republican newspapers. They show that conditions are improving, notwithstanding the stock exchange scare statements.

I repeat that the passage of the bill will to a still greater extent stimulate business and improve conditions, and, therefore, it is manifestly unfair that this institution, through its activities, should create alarm just for the purpose of stopping the proposed legislation to regulate it.

Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, the stock exchanges have had plenty of opportunity to eliminate the vicious practices that have been going on, as has been testified to and disclosed by the Senate investigating committee. It is high time that the unscrupulous Wall Street investment bankers, who are part and parcel of the New York Stock Exchange, be stopped in reenacting shortly, as they would, another crash. Before concluding I want to congratulate our courageous President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, upon his determination to effect the passage of this proposed legislation, because I know that he recognizes the tremendous, powerful opposition, and, understanding the good that will be accomplished by the adoption of the bill, he remains praiseworthily steadfast for its adoption.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me call attention to the fact that the same tactics and the same fight have been waged against the Federal Reserve Act and other beneficial legislation by these overlords of high finance, which gives the lie to the selfish and unworthy lobbyists and propagandists who have tried to put the fear of God in everybody they could reach.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise at this time to oppose the adoption of this rule. I am of the opinion that the measure which will be considered on the adoption of this rule is one of the most important pieces of legislation that this or any other Congress has considered. It has been continually before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for the last 8 or 10 weeks. Only the members of the committee themselves know how hard we have worked to try to put this legislation into shape to present it to the House. It has been a tremendously difficult task to undertake to write this legislation in order that Congress might consider it. I want to pay my respects to the Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [Mr. RAYBURN], who has worked hard in order to try to get this legislation before the House. It has been my pleasure and privilege to serve with him on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee for 18 years. I do not believe that in all my experience on this committee, any chairman has had such a tremendous task before him as has Mr. RAYBURN, chairman of our committee, during the committee consideration of this measure. [Applause.]

I am sure there are many good things in this bill. I do not question the right of the Federal Government to regulate stock exchanges. I think they should have been regulated long ago. We all know something of the manipulations and practices that have been carried on by some of the stock exchanges in the past. People who have invested their money in securities must look some place for protection. Therefore I believe it is absolutely necessary to pass legislation for the regulation of the stock exchanges, which will protect the people of our country who invest their money in securities. So with that part of the bill I am fully in accord.

But I feel confident that this measure goes far and beyond the regulation of the stock exchanges, by giving to the Federal Trade Commission the power to regulate industries, corporations, businesses, banks, and credits. Industry and business today want to be let alone for a little while. They want to try to get on their feet. They are trying to recover. They are doing everything that is humanly possible to try to bring our country back to a sound economic situation again; but they are afraid that the restrictions placed upon them in this bill will retard economic recovery and not assist it.

I have numerous letters and telegrams from industrialists, business men, especially those in the great industrial district in which I live, who are afraid of this bill. I know they are honest and sincere men. They have no desire to evade any law. I do not believe that they attempt to engage in any corrupt practices in placing their securities and stocks on the market. They suffered tremendous loss during the last 3 years of economic depression; but notwithstanding that they have kept their industries operating in order to try to give men work, to try to keep their families alive. They are afraid of this bill. They say it will make it hard for them to go forward and it will tighten up credits.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Not now. What industry wants today is a relaxation of credit, especially the heavy industries. If there can be a little relaxation of credit so that they can get credit money and put it into productive activity, we will step along pretty fast toward economic recovery.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would rather not yield at this time. I will yield later during general debate.

As I said in the beginning, there are many good things in this bill, but there are some parts of the bill, I believe, that should be modified and amended. It is not my purpose at all to try to make any fight against the passage of the bill. What I have in mind is that when the bill is read under the 5-minute rule we should try to amend some of the sections of the bill, so that it will make it a little easier for business and industry to get on their feet instead of making it more difficult for them to do so. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BANKHEALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I had intended only to ask for time in the event there was opposition to the adoption of the rule. It seems that everyone concedes this bill is of such great importance that there should be consideration of it at this time; and therefore the lack of opposition to the rule.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], who has just addressed you, expressed fear that in the administration of the act as it is proposed, in the event of its becoming law, it would tend to restrict credit and, therefore, interfere with the operation of business. The report on the bill expressly declares it to be one of the intents of the measure to prevent the concentration of money in the great centers where the exchanges operate, resulting in depriving financial or lending institutions in the outlying sections of the country of the ability to take care of the needs of the people. As a matter of fact, the consideration I have given the measure leads me to believe that that will prove to be one of its beneficial effects.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] has paid his respects to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]. I invite the attention of the House to the report filed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], for the committee, on this bill. Aside from the fact that it is a very eloquent document, it is one of the most informative statements I have read since my term in Congress, and will give you a very accurate picture of what is proposed in the bill and of the results it is expected to accomplish.

I take it that the bill is constructed largely along the line of the report of what is known as the "Roper committee." There, of course, is some departure from the report if, as a matter of fact, there was any intention in the first instance, conscious or otherwise, to follow it—on the part of the committee.

Those departures, according to the witnesses who testified, very materially improve the measure and give it better promise of good to the country as a whole.

There are, of course, important legal questions involved. There is the question of delegation of power on the part of Congress to an administrative agency; and then there is the main question as to the power of Congress to deal with the situation in any respect whatsoever.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 additional minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. So far as the delegation of power is concerned, I am not disturbed, because Congress states in definite terms what it desires accomplished and leaves to the discretion of the administrative agency how these results may best be obtained, holding the agency, of course, within limitations fixed by Congress—a maximum and a minimum, a high and a low, fixed by the Congress. In other words, Congress tells the Federal Trade Commission, which is made the administrative agency—and properly so, because it is the agency that administers the Securities Act, which is related to the pending bill—what it wants to accomplish, and lays down methods by which that result should be accomplished, and directs the Federal Trade Commission, the administrative agency, to produce those results.

In section 2 is set forth a declaration of fact which is intended to serve as a basis for the legislation. Some criticism has been made of section 2 because of the fact that Congress undertakes to legislate as a fact that which some feel should be left to the courts to determine. The declaration of facts as set forth in section 2 legislatively determined to be facts will in large measure relieve the courts of the necessity of deciding many important questions which otherwise might arise, and demonstrates the wisdom of the committee sponsoring the bill.

All of the powers of the Government are invoked in section 2, powers adjusted to peace-time conditions, and to those of war, those expressed and those implied, and all other powers; but, after all, you must come back to the proposition that if Congress has the power at all, and I think it has, to regulate these exchanges, it must be found in the commerce clause of the Constitution. There is a fear that there might be an effort under this act to regulate production; and, of course, production is not commerce. There is the fear that much might be attempted under this bill that is not properly within the power of Congress to do; but a careful consideration of the expressions of the court of last resort in many different cases that have gone to it for determination leads to the conclusion that the matter with which Congress is undertaking to deal, although in a sense it may be declared to be purely intrastate business, is so interwoven and mixed with interstate transactions as to become a part of them; and if Congress is to exercise its power and the exclusive power to regulate interstate commerce, it cannot stop at the point where it is insisted that transactions on the exchange are purely intrastate, but it must go all the way in the interest of a full and complete control and regulation of the problem.

The bill is deserving of careful study by the House; and particularly do I urge the membership of this body to read and to ponder the magnificent report filed by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. PARKS. Calling the gentleman's attention to the language at the bottom of page 9, reading as follows:

> (b) The Commission and the Federal Reserve Board, as to matters within their respective jurisdictions, shall have power by rules and regulations to define accounting, technical, and trade terms used in this act, and such definitions, insofar as they are not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall have the force of law.

Mr. COX. That language carries a very broad delegation of power, of course, but it is necessitated because of the inability of the committee to define those terms to meet all conditions—conditions now existing and conditions as they may change from day to day.

Mr. PARKS. Does not that delegate to the administrative board or commission the power to legislate for the Congress?

Mr. COX. As I say, it carries pretty broad power, but all in the interest of flexibility and workability.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER].

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a radio address delivered by my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], on the 26th of April 1934.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address of Hon. HAMILTON FISH, Jr., of New York, over the National Broadcasting Co. network, Thursday evening, April 26, 1934:

> We have heard a great deal of talk from the Democrats about the inflation of 1929, and silly statements that it was caused by the Republican tariff. We Republicans have nothing to apologize for in giving the American people the highest degree of prosperity ever known in any Nation in the world between 1921 and 1929 under a protective tariff system and successive Republican administrations. During those years the American wage earners were the best paid, the best housed, the best fed, the best clothed, and the most contented in the world. The Republican Party gave the American people an overabundance of prosperity, a veritable surplus of prosperity, and they abused it by being wasteful and extravagant. They followed the lead of the big international bankers and money changers and gambled and speculated with their earnings made in those prosperous times in the hope and delusion of becoming rich overnight without work or effort.

Did the Democratic Party point out the menace of the inflation at that time? It did not. Its present chief spokesman on monetary policies, Prof. Irving Fisher of Yale University, stated in 1929 that the existing high prices would continue indefinitely and that the peak had not been reached. Back in 1928 Alfred E. Smith, the Democratic standard bearer, came out openly for the maintenance of the protective tariff principle as being in the best interests of American labor and industry.

The present Democratic administration, however, talks in general terms about the high rates of the 1930 tariff bill, but is unable or unwilling to particularize on any schedule or on any item and fails to specify what rates are too high. The protective tariff system has built up the industries and the standards of wages and living in the United States and the attitude of the President imperils the welfare of our workingmen. American labor declines to compete with the poorly paid labor of Europe, Asia, or the forced labor of Soviet Russia.

President Roosevelt evidently cares little for the Federal Constitution or our representative form of government, or he would not have asked for unlimited powers to make reciprocal trade agreements with foreign nations. The request in itself is unworthy of the President, and must be another "brain trust" proposal entered into without mature consideration. I would have no objections to giving that power to a nonpartisan tariff commission, provided it could report back to the Congress for final approval. I would favor such a policy in dealing with Canada, Mexico, and Central and South America. We should be willing to make trade concessions to these countries which are our natural markets, but I am bitterly opposed to placing such unlimited power in the hands of any individual in direct violation of the Constitution.

The hardest blow ever dealt our democratic system of government is the request made by the President on the Congress to abdicate its constitutional powers to enact tariff legislation, which includes the taxing power.

The conferring upon the President the right to make trade agreements without the final sanction of Congress is not only unconstitutional but is an outright betrayal of our representative form of government. It amounts to an open admission by Congress that, after 145 years of dealing with tariff legislation it is now incompetent and unfit to legislate properly, intelligently, and in the public interest. Members of Congress are called upon to violate their oath of office to uphold the Constitution and betray representative government by abjectly surrendering their taxing powers to the President. When we do that we become nothing more than rubber stamps. We have already provided for a 59-cent rubber dollar, and now we are asked to rubberize the Constitution of the United States.

The President, in his recent N.R.A. speech, used these words: "The real truth of the matter is that for a number of years in our country the machinery of Democracy had failed to function." The President is not helping to uphold our American ideals and traditions by joining the hue and cry and carping criticisms both from within and from without our country against our free institutions.

For a number of years Mussolini, Stalin, and Hitler have been making public statements about the dismal failure of democracy, and particularly of the failure of parliamentary or representative government to function. They need no longer laugh up their sleeves, but if this bill is enacted into law they will cry out from the house tops the doom of democracy. What a travesty, without rhyme or reason or any emergency except a manufactured one, it would be for Members of Congress to abdicate their main powers and functions and help to destroy the usefulness of Congress and our legislative system of government. To me it is a tragedy far beyond the merits or demerits of the pending legislation.

Both my father and grandfather, of the same name, served in the Congress and no President, no matter what party he belongs to, can persuade or coerce me to betray my trust and help destroy our representative system of government which in the past has been the pride and glory of freemen and of a mighty Republic.

Why sacrifice that which has been tried in the darkest days of Civil War and in the midst of a World War to turn from our representative and legislative form of government to giving dictatorial powers to the Chief Executive? He holds no mandate from the American people to destroy American industries and the American market for goods produced by our own wage earners. Up to recently the United States has been the greatest free-trade country within its own boundaries in the world. However, this administration, by the use of subsidies and processing taxes on cotton and foodstuffs, has virtually imposed heavy duties on the American people for purchasing their own goods and mirabile dictu now proposes, through reciprocal trade agreements to show favoritism to the goods produced by cheap foreign labor in Europe, China, Japan, and Soviet Russia.

Thomas Jefferson would turn in his grave at the thought of transferring such autocratic and despotic taxing powers to the Chief Executive. Where are the constitutional and Jeffersonian Democrats in this contest against an economic dictatorship? If they vote for this bill in the Congress, it must be in open violation of every principle of Jeffersonian democracy. If they vote for this bill, it is a plea of confession and avoidance. They must confess to their constituents back home that as a party or individually they are not qualified to legislate or to act in a representative capacity in accordance with the provisions of the Federal Constitution, and in order to avoid the natural consequences of their incompetence must turn the entire tariff powers over to the President and the "brain trust."

What will be the logical answer of the people back home? "We sent you to Washington to look after our interests and to legislate intelligently and not to abdicate your constitutional powers and set up an economic dictatorship. If you are either unable or unwilling to perform your constitutional legislative duties, why we will look around and get someone who will." The price of betraying their trust as representatives of the people back home warrants defeat at their hands.

Has the flame of liberty burned so low that Members of Congress can betray the constitutional rights of a free people by turning the taxing power over to the Chief Executive without a remonstrance? Have the memorable contests and oratory of John Hampden in England, Mirabeau in France, and James Otis and Patrick Henry in our own country against taxation without parliamentary representation been all in vain? As James Otis pointed out, this principle caused one English King to lose his head and another to lose his crown, and he might have added it also caused the American revolution. Must we again revive this age-old fight? There is no alternative if this tariff bill is enacted into law.

Our revolt against England was because of taxation without representation. For that principle our forefathers fought bitterly, even sacrificing their lives in order to establish it for all time and for the benefit of Americans of succeeding generations. This is the heart and foundation of the Declaration of Independence, and was quickly transplanted into our Constitution. The whole frame of the Constitution was to protect that principle. The three distinct branches of our Government—the legislative, executive, and judicial—were set forth in the clearest and strongest language possible, in order that there be no infringement by one branch of the Government upon the other. And those great makers of the Constitution imposed the important task of taxation upon the Congress because the Congress is the direct representative of the people. Do you now wish to sacrifice that great and tried principle and turn it over, in violation of the Constitution, to the branch of the Government having no power whatever to tax? That is what this tariff bill means. It is the end of taxation by the direct representatives of the people and a restoration of taxation without representation, which caused the Revolutionary War.

The next national compaign will then have to decide as between the restoration of our American representative form of government and a socialistic dictatorship. On that issue of Americanism against socialism there can be only one answer, no matter what other issues are injected into the campaign.

What is needed badly at this juncture of our economic life, when business is at a low ebb and struggling to work its way out of a lengthy depression, is sound common sense, and there seems to be little of it. What is really needed is a restoration of business confidence in order to turn the wheels of industry and provide employment. However, business, instead of being encouraged, is discouraged at every turn by new shackles imposed by the "brain trust" and by doubts and uncertainties engendered by the proposed tariff bill. What is needed is the restoration of individual effort and initiative which has made our country the greatest, richest, and freest republic in the world. Instead, the "brain trust" promotes collectivism and regimentation and rushes from one socialistic experiment to another.

The disastrous defeat of the Republican Party in 1932 left but a small number of us in the House of Representatives to carry on sound Republican principles. Although somewhat dazed by the extent of our losses, we were not disheartened, knowing well the incapacity of the Democrats to function as a national party and to keep within bounds of reason and govern with moderation.

The Republican Party must not remain supine any longer. We must not look backward; economic conditions have changed. We must go forward on a constructive, liberal platform in favor of a square deal for both capital and labor. We must stand, as we have always stood, against state socialism, and for a sound currency, the protective tariff, and for the Federal Constitution as the rock upon which our constitutional rights and liberties are founded.

With malice toward none and charity for all I have presented my views without fear or favor on the pending legislation authorizing the President to enter into trade agreements with foreign nations which, even if held constitutional, would create further uncertainties and demoralization of American industry.

Canada, Great Britain, and other nations are emerging or have emerged from the world depression without indulging in socialistic panaceas, while the United States staggers along under a rapidly increasing burden of debt, with business confidence lacking and private enterprise discouraged and all but destroyed.

Let us give business a chance, remove the heavy hand of Government control and regimentation, and let the Federal Government come out openly and say to American business, "We are with you, not against you; you are entitled to make a reasonable profit; we believe in private enterprise and not in Government ownership." If the Government would give such assurances, it would restore confidence overnight, and the wheels of industry would begin to hum and provide permanent employment for millions of loyal American wage earners.

Let us preserve the American market for American labor and uphold the standard of wages and living that American citizens have been accustomed to in the past. Let us stand firmly for the maintenance of the Constitution and our representative government, and proclaim in no uncertain language that there is no room for socialism, communism, or fascism, or any other foreign form of dictatorship in the United States.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, as I view this situation it is a question of legislating either for the few or the many. We have heard from the few, by telegraph, telephone, and letters. We have not heard from the many. But the many are watching us, and they are expecting us to enact legislation which will protect them in the future. They are thinking of what happened to them in 1929, and they do not want that to happen again. Can you blame them? The country was shocked by the evidence brought out at the Senate committee hearing, and people look to us to do something that will cure that evil.

I have listened with a great deal of attention to the argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER]. I too come from a great industrial center, the same as he does; a greater industrial center than he comes from. A month ago a hundred business men from St. Louis came here greatly excited about this bill. We had meetings, and I suggested to them that they place their views and objections in writing, pointing out where the bill was going to be harmful, and give the memorandum to the chairman of the committee. They followed the suggestion. Yesterday I received a telephone message from the man whom I considered chairman of that delegation telling me that they were satisfied with the bill as reported, and that they did not think it could be improved upon on the floor of the House. The gentleman that called me on the telephone is president of one of the greatest chemical companies in this country. They are going back home because they say they are satisfied. They were over-scared, and they had no reason to be scared. They know what was in the original bill and they know what is in this bill. They are satisfied, and if they are satisfied I take it that when other business men learn what is really in the bill they will be satisfied.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Surely the gentleman would not compare this measure with the measure that was originally introduced.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I do not compare this measure with the one that was originally introduced. I realize many changes have been made.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They were excited over the first one.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. May I say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] again that the delegation that came from my city, through the man I considered to be their chairman, called me on the telephone and withdrew objection to the measure? If our business men do not object to this bill, I cannot understand how Ohio business men will object to it. I have not heard from the people who were here in the interest of the stock brokers. Their representatives were here for weeks, and they, too, offered suggestions, some of them I understand being accepted by the committee.

I am satisfied that the bill is sound, that it is what the country needs, and I propose to support the bill. [Applause.]

Business might not want to be regulated now, but it had no objection to being regulated a year ago, when it came here and begged the President to help. He has helped, and as a result of that help they see light where a year ago all they could see was a black cloud. If they could trust the President a year ago, it seems to me they can trust him now. Had the Securities Act of 1933 and this bill been a law 10 years ago the crash of 1929 would never have happened. We do not want another disaster such as we experienced in 1929, and the way to prevent it is to pass this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The previous question was ordered.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 9323, to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 9323, with Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House for the past 9 weeks has been wrestling with the problems raised by this suggested legislation.

A draft of a bill was submitted to Senator FLETCHER, of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee and to me as Chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. We took the draft bill as a basis for discussion, began hearings. For 5 weeks, with an intermission of 1 week, we conducted hearings and those who were in so-called "opposition" to the legislation had at least three fourths of this time. To every section of the country and to every interest affected opportunity for hearing was accorded.

The bill that is before you today, it matters not what the propagandists who oppose any sort of legislation may say, is the bill of no one man or group of men, except the 25 members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House. Partisanship has been abolished in the committee during the hearings and during the consideration of this bill in executive session, and may I pay to my Republican colleagues on the committee the compliment which I believe they, as well as my Democratic colleagues, deserve for the way in which they went about the solution of this problem. Especially do I want to remark about the two minority members of the subcommittee, Messrs. COOPER and MAPES. They were courteous and cooperative with me throughout. May I pay a special compliment to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] for his help, his wisdom, and his good judgment in working out the definite and concrete provisions of the bill. I congratulate him and thank him for the way in which he has cooperated with me.

Few bills have ever had such thorough consideration as this stock-exchange bill. As a practical matter, the matters with which it deals have been the subject of hearings ever since the investigation of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee started some 2 years ago. And to complete the certainty that the bill in its present form has been given consideration at least so far as hearing opposition is concerned, we have worked out the terms of this bill under the pressure of the most vicious and persistent lobby that any of us have ever known in Washington—a lobby that has relentlessly opposed the bill, not only in the original form, but in the present form as my committee brings it to you, and which would, I am convinced, protest against it in any form so long as there was a tooth left in it.

Before we begin discussing the provisions of the bill in its present form, and consider objections still being made to it, I want to talk about that lobby, because the possibility that that lobby has inspired most of the protests against the bill is something which has to be taken into consideration in valuing those protests fairly. I am not suggesting that persons affected by a proposed regulation have not the right to protest fairly against it to the limit of their powers. I do not object to the effort of the New York Stock Exchange and of other exchanges to rally brokers against the bill on the frank ground that it will cut down on the profits they can take from the public. But I do object to the unfair and insidious campaign of exploitation of ignorance which the stock exchanges have waged to get business, banks, investors, and anyone else they could reach to pull their chestnuts out of the fire with exaggerated interpretations of the bill and terroristic prophesies of general disaster. My experience with those who have personally interviewed me to protest against this bill and thereby given me a chance to cross-examine them on what they really know about it, has convinced me that not one critic in five hundred has even carefully read the bill or the sections he came in to talk about. They have been simply and sincerely following like so many sheep the suggestion carefully planted in their minds by those who want to prevent this or any other kind of effective stock-exchange legislation from being enacted at this session. As I have said, I believe in encouraging frank and honest and intelligent protest by those who know what they are talking about. But I do resent a deliberate campaign to swamp Congress and the press with a false appearance that the thinking criticism of the bill is much wider than it is.

There has not been a bill introduced into the Congress of the United States in all the years that it has been my privilege to serve in this body that has been attacked as viciously and in many instances as senselessly as this legislation has been attacked. Propaganda unequaled by any that I have ever before witnessed has been leveled against this legislation, against the members of the committee, and especially against the chairman of the committee.

I resent, as I think does everyone in this House, the campaign of personal pressure that has been carried on against every Congressman in this House, and I do not need to expand on the tactics of that campaign. There is not one of us who has not recognized how subtly and how cleverly the sources of pressure against us have been chosen, how there have been sent against each of us the most carefully chosen delegations of our personal friends and of our political friends, nor how bluntly there has been drummed into us the fact that this is an election year, when we need friends. These things do not need to be told, except to assure each of us that his own experience has been repeated by every other one of us.

But I do think that there have been certain phases of this compaign of manufacturing public opinion that are probably only best known to those who have actually been working with the bill. For instance, take the flood of letters we have received. It is commonplace talk that it has been an inspired flood. But only an analysis of a representative group of those letters will show how inspired and how untrustworthy they are. As the best illustrative sample I have had an examination made of approximately 5,000 letters and telegrams received by the President. I have those communications here with me and any unbeliever may examine them if he wishes.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield—not for a question but to ask if the gentleman is going to include those letters in the RECORD?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; some of them. The first interesting revelation is that apparently even the authenticity of some of this mail is not above suspicion. A letter from Pittsburgh makes the following interesting revelation:

On Monday or Tuesday of this week a petition was sent to the President with many forged signatures. This petition was dictated and placed in the customer's room of ——— (brokerage firm), of this city, by the manager, Mr. ———. It did not bear the firm name, as they explained they wished it to appear as coming from those outside the market.

I saw Mr. ——— add 9 names to the list; Mr. ———, an employee, added 2, as did Mr. ———, another employee. I saw many others, whom I did not know, write several names at a time. All employees were compelled to sign, and several customers who had previously refused were reminded they should sign. I learned later these customers had weak margin accounts.

In the light of this sort of attitude it is significant that the names signed to 50 communications from Pasadena, Calif., alone could not be found by the Postal Service or in the city directory.

But beyond the problem of genuineness, internal evidence makes it clear that the vast majority of the letters are of the chain variety written not of the writer's own free will and consideration but as the result partly of compulsion and partly of ignorance bred of a fear carefully nurtured by a whispering campaign. Three sources of this inspiration are particularly clear in the letters I have here. One is the campaign of brokerage houses among their employees and customers. Very early in this propaganda business I picked up this interoffice wire from a brokerage house in New York to all its branches:

REGARDING FLETCHER-RAYBURN BILL

Will you please ascertain and advise what is being done by concerted action of savings banks, corporations, listed or unlisted, insurance companies, in your territory in the way of organized effort for the fight on the above bill.

Are your employees alive to the fact that with the passage of the bill a great many of them will be out of employment?

Are they writing their Senators and Representatives? If not, they should do so at once, using their own note paper, not firm paper, and writing in their own way, protesting the passage of a bill which will rob them of employment. Please advise.

I do not doubt that every brokerage house in the country waged a similar concerted campaign to create protest against this bill. If you want to know one way in which they worked, remember the language of that letter from Pittsburgh about the forged names:

The employees were compelled to sign, and several customers, who had previously refused, were reminded they should sign. I learned later these customers had weak margin accounts.

But not all customers and employees were fooled or intimidated. Listen to this one:

PASADENA, CALIF.

A few minutes ago a broker from the Pasadena office of ——— & Co. called my father asking permission to sign his name to a telegram criticizing the Fletcher-Rayburn bill, all expenses to be paid by the brokerage house.

It is not justice that such communications as these should influence our President and representatives. After much thought I have come to the decision independently that the Fletcher-Rayburn bill should be made a law.

And here is an account of the campaign in New York:

LONG ISLAND, N.Y.

May I, as an American citizen and an admirer of the new deal, take a few moments of your valuable time and give you an interesting but nauseating sidelight of the Wall Street viewpoint of the Fletcher-Rayburn bill.

All the brokers and big-money men have started a campaign of their own in an effort to defeat the passing of this bit of legislation. They have warned their employees that if the bill passes they will all lose their positions, as their business simply cannot flourish under the new regulations; next, each employee and every member of his family were told to write to their Senator and Congressman protesting the passing of such bill—form letters were given to all the men to take home so the folks at home could get an idea of what to write.

But that isn't the worst offense. Yesterday each and every clerk was made to put up 50 cents toward lawyers' fees, which these "big shots" are going to hire to fight this bill. If they must fight, why can't they hire their own lawyers instead of taking it from the clerks who are only making $16 and $18 per week? Have you ever heard of anything more nauseating? The clerks don't dare refuse—for their jobs are at stake—the white-collar class is the most underpaid class in our whole American system, and nothing can be done to help them, because they haven't the initiative to organize and fight for their rights.

I don't think any of those clerks would oppose the bill if they weren't threatened with unemployment and made to write those letters under duress. It is sickening to think that these millionaires who have got the country in chaos in the first place should now use their employees as tools to fight the Government.

P.S.—If you want to print this, please omit my name, as I would lose my position.

From Boston, Mass.:

The letterhead above will identify me as at least for the present being employed by one of the common sources which you referred to in your letters to Senator FLETCHER and Representative RAYBURN. Probably with my attitude in support of your principles and my utter disgust at the obnoxious abuses of the public trust in this business I will not be here long. In fact, I am told by a member that feeling the way I do I am in the wrong business.

It has been very interesting to me to observe the common source battling your desires for right with mass meetings, petitions to be signed under virtual threats, newspaper articles, raising funds for committees, and a most complete effort at regimentation of business corporations, chambers of commerce, advertising agencies, investment services, counselors, et al., by means of public speakers over the radio, and public assemblies and circulars, one of which I am enclosing for your amusement. Also letters by the many to Senators, Congressmen, and committeemen, from persons of and under age claiming Democratic political faith, falsely in many cases, but that if this bill is passed it will make violate their constitutional liberty, rights, etc. In fairness to many of these writers I would say that they are right in thought but frightened to action against their better judgment.

Now, as a customer's man and naturally still desirous of being able to earn a living I have read the bill carefully and I see that it contains nothing that I will object to. The means of administration of the bill are above my ability to argue. Whether the Federal Trade Commission should be the supervisory board I cannot say, but certainly not a committee made up of stock-exchange members. Likewise, whether the Federal Reserve bank should have control over margin requirements I cannot say, but they should be made standard by a law. I believe, in fact, that the method of control of margins being argued is merely a camouflage and in reality what the propagandists are really fighting for are lower margin requirements instead of who should control them.

May I say that I hope your Congress will not be influenced against their good judgment in support of your wishes * * *.

Here is a letter from Los Angeles describing the campaign among brokers' employees in that city:

They were instructed not to write these letters on a typewriter and not to mention their firm's name. Then they had to take these letters to their employer in an unsealed envelop so that he may examine its contents.

San Francisco, Calif.:

We all had to sign a petition to you yesterday. Please have someone take a knife and cut my name out. I have to have a job and just had to sign or quit.

When this bill was first introduced, a great many said we ought to know what the Federal Reserve Board thinks and what the Treasury Department thinks. It was committed to their hands for 8 days and they went over it line by line, and then Governor Black, of the Federal Reserve Board, had the courage to come up and say that he had read the bill from end to end and he thought it was a workable bill. I shall refer to him a little later. Mr. Smith, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, came up and said all in favor of it that he had been instructed to say.

Now, here are some letters that would appeal to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], since he gave out his learned statement this morning with reference to "the boys" that he claims wrote this bill.

One correspondent, giving an address in Gloucester, Mass., wrote on March 22:

I have been studying the new bill for stock exchanges as recently reported by the committee and I cannot see that there has been much improvement in it over the original draft. The only thing I can think of when I visualize the workings of the bill is good old Russia. We seem to be drifting there fast.

The following day a letter signed with another name, giving an address in Saugus, was written as follows:

I have been studying the new bill for stock exchanges as recently reported by the committee and I cannot see that there has been much improvement in it over the original draft. The only thing I can think of when I visualize the workings of the bill is good old Russia. We seem to be drifting there fast.

On the same day a third letter, signed with still a third name, was written from Braintree Highlands, Mass., saying:

I have been studying the new bill for stock exchanges as recently reported by the committee and I cannot see that there has been much improvement in it over the original draft.

The only difference between the third letter and the other two is the failure to think of "good old Russia." I have only read the first paragraph in each case, the remainder of the letters is virtually identical. The stationery on which these three letters are written differs only in the color of the border.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will ask the indulgence of the committee that I may continue until I get a little further along.

Mr. RANKIN. I think Greece and Turkey should be mentioned since Mr. Insull has been over there.

Mr. RAYBURN. There are two typewritten letters apparently from stenographers on plain stationery giving a home address and signed by the stenographer. But habitual honesty led the purported author to place the customary initials in the lower left-hand corner and these reveal that the letters were dictated to the writer by someone else, probably the employer.

And let me say to you about this bill, the impression has been created that everybody who operated on an exchange, that everybody who was a member of an exchange, that everybody who was a manufacturer or a business man is opposed to this legislation; and yet men came to my office and filed strong statements advocating a strong stock exchange bill and asking me to put their statements in the RECORD without filing their names.

One gentleman who is a big broker on the New York Stock Exchange came to my office and said, "I think you have a good bill, with two amendments." We went over his two suggestions, and after discussing them with him, found he had been misinformed about what they meant, and he said, "The people who have been talking to me did not understand this bill as you have explained it." Knowing he is a man of high type and an important broker on the great exchanges, I said to him, "Then it looks to me like you could help us stop some of this propaganda. You say you are for a strong bill and that you know about these evils that should be corrected." He said, "Well, I am for a strong bill. I am for this legislation. These evils should be outlawed and should be corrected, and if it were necessary for me to lay my head on the block in order to get a good strong bill, I would do it; but that is exactly what it would mean. I have a house in New York and several branch houses throughout the country and 800 employees in my houses. Some of them violate some rule or regulation of the New York Stock Exchange every day and they are passed over, but if I put myself up in opposition to them as favoring a good strong bill, they will destroy me by 10 o'clock in the morning."

Business men throughout the country have come to me and said that they wanted a good strong bill.

But here is a letter that caps the climax. Three writers ask in identical words, "What would Jefferson think of the Fletcher-Rayburn bill? He would, of course, use every influence to defeat it." May I ask you what that great democrat—not speaking in a partisan sense of the word—what would that great democrat, who believed in honesty in Government and honesty in all the affairs of men, have said about 1929 and the conditions and the practices that brought about the loss of untold millions to the people of this country? What would Jackson have said, what would Lincoln have said, what would Cleveland have said, what would Theodore Roosevelt have said? They would have said the same thing, that this President Roosevelt today says; that he "wants a law that will prevent the elements getting so mixed that it will bring about conditions like we had in 1927, 1928, culminating in 1929." [Applause.]

A representative of one of the large exchanges came to my office one morning and said, "Since you revised your bill"—that is, the first revision (the subcommittee and the full committee took 2 weeks to revise the revision)—"since you revised your bill, with four changes you have got a workable bill. I should like to come before your committee and be heard." I said, "You have had three quarters of the time in opposition to the bill, but tomorrow I will give you 30 minutes."

The next morning he came in and had 30 minutes and presented his four amendments.

Then I asked him the question, "If we were to adopt your four suggestions, would you support the legislation?" He threw his hands in the air and said, "No. The bill is unconstitutional. It is unworkable, destructive and not constructive."

Now, if the Membership of the House expects any man or any group of men to write any sort of a bill or law that will be accepted and endorsed by the people who do not want any sort of regulation, then they are mistaken. It matters not how you revise this bill, not what you take out of it, the people who operate the exchanges do not want it. They want self-regulation; and when temptation comes, self-regulation will mean the kind of regulation you had in 1929.

The New York exchange holds itself up by rules adopted recently establishing self-regulation and say that such rules ought to be sufficient. But it must be remembered that the

New York Stock Exchange is not the only exchange in the country, and furthermore, the New York Stock Exchange, if it can pass a rule, can revoke that rule as well.

We want to lodge the authority, power, and direction somewhere in some agency of the Government as representing the people of the country, with the right to approve or disapprove the rules and regulations of the exchanges, and with the power and authority to enforce the rules and regulations if in the public interest it is found necessary.

Another clear source of inspiration for these letters in addition to the pressure brought by brokers' houses on their customers and employees is the propaganda conducted by many of the larger corporations of big business men. For example, the Associated Gas & Electric Co., the utility now under investigation in New York State, relayed to thousands of small, ignorant stockholders, who could not understand the bill even if they had an opportunity to read it, the exaggerated account of it given by the New York Stock Exchange.

Many almost illiterate stockholders and bondholders have been frightened by this campaign into thinking that passage of the bill will destroy what little value remains of the securities previously sold them by high-pressure methods, and have written pathetic letters often enclosing the company's circular or mentioning it by name.

An organization calling itself the Chicago Association of Commerce has issued a circular beginning as follows:

> The Chicago Association of Commerce, with a membership of some 4,000 business houses located in the Chicago metropolitan area, opposes S. 2693 and H.R. 7852, proposing the National Securities Act of 1934, in the following particulars:

This is what a member of the association has to say about this statement:

> I am wondering if the association has the right to undertake to express itself on behalf of all its members in this way without their consent. * * *
> I am not ready to say, for example, that the National Securities Act of 1934 is the dangerous instrument that the association's statement would have one believe it to be. * * * I have had an accurate account at one of the brokers for many years so that I am not speaking unfamiliar with the stock market.

Of all letters examined about 300 represent forms which have been followed word for word, and another 200 are obviously based on a given model, although not absolutely identical.

This sort of thing is particularly insidious when carried on under the veil of governmental authority. An example turned up the other day: When questioned by the Scripps-Howard press, Mr. George Houston, the actual head of the so-called "durable goods committee of the code authorities under the N.R.A.", admitted that a formal memorandum of proposed changes in the bill to satisfy business, presented to me as the official work of the committee, was at least physically mimeographed at 2 o'clock in the morning on the machines of the New York Stock Exchange lobby in the suite of Mr. Whitney's lawyers in the Willard Hotel.

The business man who brought me the memorandum as the work of the committee—a perfectly honest man whose sincerity I thoroughly trust—freely admitted after the exposure that he had been "played for a sucker." The National Manufacturers Association and its own lobby here in Washington were clearly implicated in the preparation of the memorandum under these circumstances. We have had all sorts of reports from N.R.A. committees in the last couple of months about the Securities Act and similar legislation. I wonder how many of the reports of such committees and how many reports of chambers of commerce, business bureaus, and national associations of this and that have resulted in 2-o'clock-in-the-morning visits to the Willard Hotel or similar sources of disinterested advice to the public. I am sorry that more of the press did not carry General Johnson's highly significant statement after the durable goods committee incident in which he openly repudiated any authority of that or similar committees to speak for the N.R.A. And yet in the letters coming to the President are clear references to the effect of that report of the durable goods committee on an unsuspecting business public. I have offered you just a few illustrative concrete instances of activity which we have felt going on about us. Of themselves, if they were all, they might be comparatively unimportant. But they are very important not for what they are but for what they lead us to suspect as indications of the kind of thing which a thousand times multiplied has been going on invisibly around us.

The blunt fact about the reaction of that portion of the public which has been induced by this campaign to protest against the bill—particularly that part of the business public which is excited about the regimentation of industry supposed to lurk in the bill—is that it has either been unable to comprehend the necessarily complicated provisions of this long bill and the many drafts of it which have followed one another in the course of its revision, or that it has simply swallowed the opinions of propagandists whole without reading what they are supposed to be talking about.

I tell you from my own experience at the center of all this agitation that that part of the public which has been used by the New York Stock Exchange in its propaganda to create an appearance of a furore of protest against this bill is not representative of anything but the smallest portion of the public as a whole—and the public as a whole, perfectly conscious of the propaganda, are watching with interest to see whether we succumb to it. For every frightened security holder and every brokerage-house clerk and every nervous corporation executive who has let the stock exchange do this thinking for him, there are thousands whom experience with securities has made hard-headed who are doing some thinking for themselves, and are watching to see whether Congress hesitates to regulate the great financial powers of Wall Street whom tradition says cannot be controlled by the forces of Government.

One of the things that has been most frequently used to frighten people, particularly business men, are the provisions of the bill that have to do with reporting by corporations. When, for example, the business man whom I have referred to as admitting to me that he had been "played as a sucker", came to me with the memorandum mimeographed at the Washington headquarters of the New York Stock Exchange, I told him that I would take the bill and sit down with him and if there was a line in the bill or a sentence that did an injustice to or put an unreasonable burden upon business in this country I would be the first to move to strike it out. I then took the bill up and said to this gentleman, "Your first amendment is to strike out section 2 of the bill entirely. Why do you want to strike that out? It simply declares that this matter has reached the point where it is charged with a public interest, that there is necessity for regulation." He then said that he did not care whether it was stricken out or not, but I said, "You move to strike it out."

At every place in the bill where the term "or appropriate in the public interest" occurs, they have proposed to strike it out. Just why should a statement like that be objectionable? If the Commission that administers this law must find, before it can reach a rule or regulation, that it is in the public interest or for the interest of the investing public, what objection is there to that? It seems to me that that is a loosening of the bill. But that gets back to another thing. This bill now is criticized because it gives too much power to the administrative authorities, but all through the hearings the representatives of the exchanges and the so-called "representatives of business" in this country pounded into the committee the unwisdom of particularizing in the legislation, or going further than simply fixing the outstanding standards for the administrative body to go by. We went through the bill, and everywhere that we could find a place to give authority to the Commission to make rules and regulations to govern these matters we gave it to them, and now you will hear throughout this House those who are not voting against the bill but voting for every amendment which pulls the teeth of it, saying that they fear that we are giving to a commission or board here in Washington unheard-of powers to look into the affairs of business.

Mr. Chairman, there is no use trying to write a bill that will be effective, which will cure these evils, that will protect the public in general and investors in particular, which will please also the great exchanges of this country. These stock exchange amendments were offered in the committee. We were able to vote them down. They will be offered on the floor of this House, and I intend to brand every one of them as they come. Some people in this country may want the New York Stock Exchange and its satellites and hirelings to write this legislation. I do not. [Applause.] I do want to write a bill that will deal justly and fairly with every group and with every individual in this land. I have been held up I know as an enemy to business, but there is nothing in my career in Congress that warrants it. Twenty-four months ago I was called one of the arch reactionaries of the House and of the country, but when I went out with the securities' bill and tried to protect the investing public in this country by giving them information about securities that were offered to them, and stopping a lot of pretty bad practices that were going on, I was then advertised as a radical or a bolshevik. When I came along following the recommendation of the President of the United States and the platform upon which he was elected and upon which each and every one of you on my right was elected, trying to carry out this legislation in the protection of the people against the rapacities of the past, I am again branded as one who is willing to go out and destroy business.

Let me tell you something, and I say this to representatives of the exchanges who are doing me the honor to sit in the galleries this afternoon. They have not yet lost hope that they will be able to pull the teeth of this bill so they are still around here, and I am glad to have them here.

They are engaged in a business that ought to go on, that has a very legitimate and important function to perform. We should have a market place for the exchange of securities, but it should be a clean and honest market place.

They are in a business that, since 1929, has not stood in such high favor in the United States. In their own selfish interest, if their judgment was used, instead of their fear, they would want a strong bill for the regulation of the exchanges in order to reestablish the faith and confidence of the people so that they will again in the future, if they forget their unhappy experience of the past, use these exchanges as a place of barter and trade for securities.

Then I took up sections 11 and 12 of this bill with this business man, and I said to him, "if you will point out one thing in sections 11 and 12", and that is the registration requirements for securities, "one line that regiments business, that interferes with the operation of your own business, that makes it unduly burdensome, I will take it out." I sat down with him, and I began to read these things to him. What are they supposed to do? When they try to scare you about what the Commission is asking them to do, let me show you what the committee on stock list of the New York Stock Exchange asks them to do and the questions which they ask them to answer. Here I hold in my hand the printed list of requirements; observe all those questions covering several pages, which must be answered. The New York Curb Exchange also has detailed requirements. Now, what do we ask them to report? You know there is a remarkable thing about this bill. It contained a provision that they should report to the stock exchange and to the Commission. They objected to reporting to the Commission. Why I was never able to figure out; but they were perfectly willing that a copy of the report that they made to the stock exchange, when they had an application for a listing of their securities, should be filed with the Commission. What the difference is in that I do not know, but we did put in the bill a provision that they should file the original with the stock exchange and a duplicate with the Commission if the Commission asked them to do it.

Now, what do we ask them to do?

(A) The organization, financial structure, and nature of business.

Is that harmful? Is that irksome?

(B) The terms, position, rights, and privileges of the different classes of securities outstanding.

(C) The terms on which their securities are to be, and during the preceding 3 years have been, offered to the public or otherwise.

(D) The directors and officers, their remuneration (including amounts paid, or which may become payable, as a bonus or under a profit-sharing agreement), and their interests in the securities of, and their material contracts with, the issuer and any person directly or indirectly controlling or controlled by, or under direct or indirect common control with, the issuer.

Is it asking too much that they give us their bonus lists? I think, my friends, that when an officer of a company is paid a salary sufficient unto his labor, then if the company happens to make profits, those profits are the property of the stockholders. I think it is a very bad thing not only from the standpoint of what I think is the right thing to do but also from the standpoint of the very looks of things for a man to receive $150,000 a year as a salary and eight or nine hundred thousand dollars at the end of the year as a bonus.

It appears to me that if a man is paid from $75,000 to $150,000 a year, he is reasonably compensated; and if not he alone but all of the people in the organization and all the people that labor to produce what it sells should make $900,000, it either ought to be distributed to the stockholders or among those who made it possible. We ask merely that the stockholders be informed of the bonuses. If that is regimentation of business, then that is it.

Then we ask for:

Remuneration (including amounts paid, or which may become payable, as a bonus or under a profit-sharing agreement) in excess of $10,000 per annum, to any person other than directors and officers.

(F) Management and service contracts of material importance to investors;

(G) Options existing or to be created with respect to their securities;

(H) Balance sheets for the 3 preceding years certified by independent public accountants or otherwise, as the Commission may prescribe; and

(I) Profit-and-loss statements for the 3 preceding years, certified by independent public accountants or otherwise, as the Commission may prescribe.

Such copies of articles of incorporation, bylaws, trust indentures, or corresponding documents by whatever name known, underwriting arrangements, and other similar documents.

And so forth.

Now, I want to say that before a man can list his stock on the New York Stock Exchange, he may be required to file that much or more (apart from the disclosure of bonuses, which certainly the investing public has a right to know), but there seems to be a fear running around that the Government is going to regiment business. If any gentleman on the floor of this House during the consideration of this bill—and we have had all of these amendments—can demonstrate to the membership of this committee on either side of the House that there is regimentation of business in this bill, we are willing to take it out.

Now, the talk has been that they would have uniform accounting for all corporations of the country. There is nothing like that in this bill. There is no attempt to do it, but if an agency of the Government is going to try to regulate the sale or dealing in securities of any corporation doing business in interstate commerce, there must be intelligent reporting so that somebody can understand it.

I asked some of our railroad brethren years ago, when we were trying to get them to bring about a system of uniform accounting, which we afterward had to pass a law to make them do, why they did not get up figures that somebody could understand. It took a Philadelphia lawyer to understand their figures. Finally, by act of Congress, they were forced to bring about a uniform system of accounting, which they fought very strenuously, and today each railroad will tell you that they themselves would oppose the repeal of that requirement.

I do not say that the average business in the country is on the same footing with the railroads, because the railroads are strictly a regimented industry, being public-service corporations and subject in all of their dealings to the law.

I do challenge these people to show me where there is any interference, but they cannot show it. This fear went out from Washington. Propaganda was spread throughout the land. It went to every manufacturer; it went to every bank; it went to every employee of these houses throughout the country, a campaign of misrepresentation and attempted fright.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief interruption at this point?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I am quoting from the report of the New York Stock Exchange for the year 1931–32, written by Mr. Whitney himself. In it this statement is made:

The exchange is a firm believer in the necessity of full and complete statistics about corporate affairs. It has for many years urged companies to give practical and complete information to shareholders about all aspects of company business.

Mr. RAYBURN. I agree with that statement. The president of the exchange also said in an address last year before the Chamber of Commerce of Cleveland:

In the nineteenth century even large businesses which had grown out of family enterprises were still controlled or at least influenced by the judgment of a few stockholders who held a substantial interest in the company and who were active in its affairs. Today that is the exception rather than the rule. I do not believe that as a result of this change the officials who have been operating our great corporations are less efficient than those who would have been chosen under the old order of things. I believe quite the contrary. But a vastly important consequence of this change is the fact that the published reports of our great companies are now the only authoritative information upon which investors can judge of the success or failure of the companies in which they have put their money. In the past, when there were few stockholders and these few were actively interested in the business of the company, the amount of information published by American companies was meager, and it became an almost invariable habit to set up company accounts in the most simple form of a balance sheet and income account. In many instances these financial statements were far from informative, and, indeed, practically no effort was made to state in them facts of the utmost importance. I shall not attempt to go into a technical discussion of accounting principles, but I can illustrate what I mean by a very simple example. Many industrial enterprises necessarily have on hand at all times inventories of either finished goods or raw materials. If these inventories are valued simply at the amount paid for them, the condition of the company often appears to be better or worse than it is in reality. It is only in recent years that the necessity of valuing inventories at or below market value has been generally recognized, and until this principle is applied universally, there is always the chance that company statements may mislead investors rather than inform them. There are many similar situations in accounting practice due to the fact, already mentioned, that some of our generally accepted methods of accounting were established by companies owned and operated by a few stockholders. These methods are not adequate to inform the investors of today who are obliged to rely almost entirely for their information upon financial statements sent to them by their companies.

It is now generally recognized that the lack of complete disclosure of the results of business operations contributed to the inflation of security values which preceded the panic of 1929. More frank and more complete information might have prevented many people from assuming that profitable operation would continue indefinitely. Investors were satisfied if it appeared that their company had earned more in the current year than in the preceding period and were induced by that information alone to hope that the future would show nothing but increasing profits. Had they known that in some instances a large part of these profits was due to nonrecurring and fortuitous circumstances, and in others to the use of accounting methods which resulted in an overstatement of income, they might have been less optimistic and security prices might not have become so inflated.

The public today insists upon more complete and accurate financial statements from publicly owned companies and I am sure that the officials and directors of these corporations, realizing the reasonableness of this demand, will furnish investors with adequate information. There have not been many instances where the failure to give complete information was due to a desire on the part of directors or officers to secure unfair personal advantage. However, many company officials did not publish complete financial statements because they were afraid that the disclosure of too much information would put their companies at a disadvantage in meeting competition, not only from other American corporations, but frequently from foreign companies engaged in the same line of business. This fear, though genuine, has in large measure proved to be unfounded.

And it is to the credit of the New York Stock Exchange that within the limits of its power it has done a great deal to require more and more information for the benefit of stockholders.

"Why then", say opponents of the bill, "is not the problem of reports of corporation left to the exchanges without Government interference?" One answer is that the exchanges are not in a position as a practical matter to require issuing corporations to give them as much information as modern standards consider is indispensably necessary to aid decent appraisal by an investor of the value of a security he proposes to buy or sell. Exchanges can only go so far before selfish managements and interlocking banking control decide that it is more advisable to fight the exchanges' requirements than to tell shareholders the entire truth about the use of their money. Another reason is that when the amount of information which is to be furnished depends upon the power of exchanges to enforce requirements as a matter of private contract in return for the advantages of listing, the trading positions of exchanges vary greatly. Requirements which the great New York Stock Exchange can insist upon, smaller exchanges cannot insist upon and get enough business to live. Writing minimum listing requirements for all listed corporations into sections 11 and 12 assures a decent minimum of listing requirements for securities listed on all exchanges, and having the information filed not only with the exchanges, but with a Federal agency, assures that the information will really be available and readily accessible to investors who might have difficulty approaching the exchanges.

The information asked for by sections 11 and 12 goes no further than the present requirements of the New York Stock Exchange except in respect of the revelation of the remuneration of officers, directors, and high-salaried employees. As a legal matter, the New York Stock Exchange can demand far more than is required by sections 11 and 12 since there is no limit to what, by private contract, the exchange can demand of applicants. It requires as part of its listing agreement that the applicant "furnish the New York Stock Exchange, on demand, such reasonable information concerning the company as may be required." Companies that are subject to such demands upon them on the part of private interest operating a public-securities market, can hardly be heard to object to the minimum listing requirements set forth in sections 11 and 12.

As for the new requirements set out in sections 11 and 12 for the revelation of the compensation and remuneration which officers, directors, and high-salaried employees take out of the business, that is an advance which the public investors of the United States who are paying that compensation and remuneration will demand regardless of the protests of the managements whom they are paying and the charges that such revelation may interfere with essential secrecy in the operation of corporations.

Now, coming back to this campaign of fear, the President of the United States wrote me a letter before he went away on a short vacation, in which he called attention to this propaganda and pointed out that it came from a common source; and, of course, it was paid for from a common source. I, too, can bear witness to this organized propaganda. I have in my hands a batch of more than 200 letters. As you may observe, they came from a common source, from the same neighborhood. Every one is in the same colored envelope, but they are written in different hands.

As I pointed out before, the Associated Gas & Electric System is circularizing everybody who owns any of its stock. While it may not be information to you, it is true nevertheless, that the Associated Gas & Electric System throughout its existence—and it is a concern whose securities run into hundreds of millions of dollars—has been the most noncooperative organization in the United States, both with regard to State commissions and to legislative bodies. This system, of course, is dominated by the personality of Mr. Hobson; and he is pretty hard to get before a committee, as some of you may know.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The objections of most of the utilities were met by an amendment accepted by the committee, which amendment inserted the words "or any State." I think this was the principal objection from the utility companies.

Mr. RAYBURN. Of course, we put the language in the bill "of any State"; but we also provided that the commission should be allowed to call for other things, because we know some of the States do not have any laws with reference to this question and some have very poor laws with respect to it.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If I may make this further observation, the fear expressed by the utilities was that they would have to set up a double-accounting system. They now have to conform to a system set up by each State public utility commission; and the thing about which they complained in the bill in its original form was that it would probably cause them to set up a double-accounting system.

Mr. RAYBURN. The requirement that adequate and intelligent reports be made for the benefit of investors does not necessitate the keeping of two sets of books.

Remember that we have been hearing for these 2 months on this subject of corporate reports only the voice of corporation managements. We have heard very little on behalf of the great unorganized and inarticulate mass of millions of security holders, who look to us to understand their side of the problem without a lobby. But three indications of their side of the problem have been presented in the course of the hearings that I think should be known. Two of them are communications from great investment services that for many years have tried to make available to the great investing public knowledge of the value of corporate securities—Standard Statistics Service and Moody's Investment Service. The following excerpt appeared in the Standard Trade and Securities Service of Standard Statistics Service on April 7:

IMPROVED CORPORATION STATEMENTS

The section of the proposed act dealing with the adequacy, frequency, and uniformity of corporation reports is, in our judgment, a prudent one.

To most of the large corporations the securities of which are now listed on national exchanges, the supervision over corporation reports that is provided for will constitute not much more than a mere technicality. These corporations are already, in the main, rendering adequate reports to their security owners of sufficient frequency and in sufficient detail.

On the other hand, there still exist, unhappily, a limited number of corporations which have invited the investing public to advance loans to them, or to join in partnership with them, but which still refuse to render the proper kind of financial reports to the public. Indeed, a limited number of cases can be cited where there are securities in the hands of the public but where the corporations which issued these securities refuse to give any financial information whatsoever to security owners.

From the standpoint of the investing public, such an attitude appeals to us as entirely indefensible.

In sum, this portion of the act is quite unlikely to work any hardship upon those thousands of corporations which are already playing fair with their security owners. It does, however, compel necessary publicity on the part of that relatively small group which has not been playing fair.

There is every reason to believe that the Federal Trade Commission, in administering this section of the act, will not be unduly severe.

The following is a letter I received from Moody's, one of the oldest investment services in the United States:

APRIL 10, 1934.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
House of Representatives Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

Re: Revised National Securities Exchange Act of 1934.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: We have noted, from press reports, that some amendments are being offered and made in the above bill.

We write to express the hope that those sections which require issuing corporations to make available to the public information on registered securities will not be weakened. We refer to section 11 (b) and to section 12.

In urging that there be no amendments to these sections such as would materially affect them, we speak as an organization that has been for more than 30 years engaged in furnishing information and counsel to institutions and individual investors.

In our experience there is no room for doubt that the more information there is available concerning a corporation, the more accurate one's judgment can be as to the investment qualifications of its securities. Or, to put it in the opposite way, lack of adequate and frequent information concerning a corporation prevents effectively thorough appraisal of the investment qualifications of its securities.

We do not wish to argue that availability of information will ipso facto protect investors against losses. Intelligence cannot, of course, be legislated into investors' minds. But exercise of intelligence, where it does exist, can be made possible if adequate information be made available as set forth in the above-mentioned sections of the bill. This would also tend to prevent a certain amount of that type of market manipulation which is based on absence of information.

Yours very truly,

RUSSELL LEAVITT, Vice President.

And one of the few witnesses who appeared on the investors' side of this problem, the manager of a great investment trust in New York City, a professional investor of the public's money and a professional analyst for that purpose of corporation reports, made a statement in part as follows:

If by the term "trade secrets", opponents of this measure mean excessive margins of profit, which would be revealed only by the publication of earnings against sales, then these critics have cited the best reason for publication of the figures.

If margins of profit are too wide and prices are too high, the consuming public should be afforded the protection of open competition and investors should be apprised that the margins are so wide as to become untenable through competition.

Some directors and executives of corporations have failed to keep pace with the progressive transfer of control from private groups to the public. The directors today are merely employees working in the interest of the investing public. The latter never intended to place the directors in a preferential position with regard to information concerning the company's earnings, but this situation exists in hundreds of companies today.

Pool operations in recent years have been concentrated largely in stocks of companies which report annually and which thus preserve secrecy and mystery concerning their earnings for months at a time.

A study of hundreds of companies in the last 7 years has convinced me that the units which do not report adequately on their operations and financial status have either been losing ground competitively, have been pursuing policies which they do not care to have exposed, have been operating on margins of profit which are clearly excessive, or have been influenced in their public relations by private groups, which have not yet recognized the shifting of ownership of great corporations to the public and are not sensitive to the fiduciary responsibilities of directors and officers.

The reporting of large corporations has improved in recent years, partly as a result of the leadership of the New York Stock Exchange, and because of the increasing recognition of the rights of the smaller investor, which has been produced by the recent depression.

If the corporate form of organization is to endure, millions of investors must be protected by legislation that will ensure that the small stockholder and the large one will be treated on a basis of equality.

The major problem of investors and investment trusts is the appraising of values. Whenever the financial community has gotten too far away from values and loses its perspective, as in 1929 and the summer of 1933, there has been trouble.

The problem of appraising values depends on three factors: General business conditions, on which Government agencies, such as the Federal Reserve Board and the Department of Commerce, present full information; the condition of the industry in which one is seeking to invest funds; and the financial record of the individual companies. The success of the investor in ascertaining facts regarding industries and individual companies is dependent largely on the policy of companies as to issuing adequate and frequent reports.

I do not believe that any company would have the effrontery to seek to evade the reporting requirements of this bill by withdrawing its shares from listing on any exchange in this country.

These, then, are the reasons why provisions for decent and frequent corporate reports are included in this stock exchange bill. They simply standardize requirements which the stock exchanges are already making at a standard which offers at least a beginning of protection against the concealment of management interests of investors who have hitherto bought into listed securities almost entirely blindly.

A lot has been said to the effect that this bill would cause deflation of outstanding securities. I think Governor Black of the Federal Reserve Board is the best authority on this question. Governor Black was asked the direct question if he thought it would bring about a deflation of securities and he said:

I have heard "wolf" cried so much about business in this country that I do not have much fear about it. We heard the same thing when we went off of the gold standard; you heard the same thing about the gold clause, and I felt the same way when they took our gold, but I was mistaken in all three things.

Governor Black was asked what effect a similar law would have had upon the situation in 1929 and he said that nothing could have stopped the wild speculation of 1929 because the people practically went insane; but he did say that if such a law had been in effect in 1927 and 1928 preceding the break in New York, that it could have been materially lessened. That is what he says about these so-called "deflationary provisions."

In section 3 of the bill we set forth the definitions; and I shall insert in the RECORD at this point some further definitions of terms which may be used in connection with the discussions of the bill in nontechnical language and are only intended to assist the Members in understanding the bill.

A "put" is an option to sell a security at a given price within a given time.

A "call" is an option to buy a security at a given price within a given time.

A "straddle" is a combination of a "put" and a "call", giving the holder the right either to sell or to buy the security at specified prices within a given time.

The term "pool" is used to describe operations to control the price of a security, usually by means of a syndicate or joint account. Under the bill all efforts to raise or lower the price of a security are outlawed. Pools to peg or stabilize the price are subject to regulation by the Commission.

A "short sale" is a sale by a person who does not own the security sold. He borrows the security to make delivery to the buyer and subsequently buys the security in order to return it to the lender. His profit is the difference between the price at which he sells and that at which he subsequently buys.

"Floor trading" is trading on the premises of an exchange by members for their own account. As used in the bill it also includes trading for a discretionary account.

"Arbitrage" is the simultaneous buying of a security in one market at a price and selling it in another market at another price for the purpose of profiting from the difference in prices in such markets.

"Over-the-counter market", as used in this bill, refers to a market maintained off a regular exchange by one or more dealers or brokers. The market must be maintained both for the purchase and the sale of the securities in question. A dealer or broker who merely undertakes a request to find a purchaser for a person who wants to sell or to find a seller for a person who wants to buy, would not usually be considered to be creating a market. But the dealer who normally is willing to quote "a market", that is, both the price at which he will buy and the price at which he will sell, is creating an over-the-counter market.

Section 6 is the section around which a great controversy has raged. It deals with the all-important problem of credit control or margins. I have from the beginning considered this problem paramount. A reasonably high margin requirement is essential so that a person cannot get in the market on a shoe string one day and be one of the sheared lambs when he wakes up the next morning. I do not believe people ought to be allowed to go into the market on a 10-, 15-, 20-, or 25-percent margin.

Originally we proposed in this bill that the margin should be 60 percent for the initial margin or 40 percent as the initial loan. Then in order to bring about an agreement, I proposed 50 percent for margins and 50 percent for loan values. The subcommittee finally went to an initial margin of 45 percent and a borrowing of 55 percent, which the full committee accepted. And considerable flexibility in the application of the margin rules is afforded by the provision permitting a broker to lend 100 percent of the 3-year low, not exceeding 75 percent of the market. Indeed, according to the calculations of Standard Statistics, the margins required on the basis of the present level of the market would not exceed 35 percent.

Governor Black has been quoted all around as wanting this bill flexible as far as margins are concerned. A proposal was made from some source that we have a marginal requirement in the bill, but that no standard should be set up and that the margin business should be turned over entirely to the administrative body. May I say one thing about these margins? It matters not whether this bill is administered by a board or a commission and the Federal Reserve Board in conjunction with them, but it is important that the margin requirements for member banks of the Federal Reserve System, the margin requirements for nonmember banks, and the margin requirements for brokers be put under the administration of the same body. If the margins for the member banks are under the Federal Reserve System, then the margins for the nonmember banks and for the brokers should be handled by the same agency. As Governor Black said, whether or not there was a standard fixed in the bill the margin requirements should be administered by the same body for the reason that if the Federal Reserve Board fixed one marginal requirement for member banks and another administrative authority fixed another margin for brokers and nonmember banks, speculative loans would move from the brokers and nonmember banks to member banks, or from member banks to the brokers and nonmember banks, depending upon which margin requirements were the higher.

But believing that we should set up a flag somewhere, and that we should give some congressional expression to what we regarded as a proper margin requirement, we set up 45 percent as the initial margin, and yet we give the Federal Reserve Board, when it finds it in the public interest, and necessary to the free flow of trade and commerce, power to vary even the 45-percent margin for initial opening of accounts. Not only that, but we go farther and say that the maintenance of the account shall be left entirely with the administrative body. It seemed to those of us who believe in some sort of a standard being fixed by Congress, some kind of a bright line drawn or signal set up, that we would have failed in our duty if we did not give some indication to the Reserve Board as to what we regarded as a fair minimum-margin requirement.

I believe that the House, after discussion and when we begin to read this bill under the 5-minute rule, will come to the same conclusion that the subcommittee and the full committee came to, namely, that we should have a marginal requirement in this bill.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Assume a man employed by a company whose stock is dealt with on an exchange. If that man wants to buy further of his company's stock and goes to the banker to make a loan in order to increase his stock holdings, does this bill limit his banker as to the amount of money the banker may lend him to buy his company's stock?

Mr. RAYBURN. If it is listed on the exchange, yes.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. So that young men who have built themselves up by buying their company's stock, of which they know much, are limited in the future and may not be able to do so?

Mr. RAYBURN. They will unless by rules and regulations it is provided otherwise, if the stock is listed on the New York exchange.

If there has been a thing in the world that has been abused throughout this country, and if there is one way in which management perpetuates itself in office, it is by the use of proxies. We treat that situation here and say that the proxies shall be used under such rules and regulations as the administrative body may promulgate.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McFADDEN. I wanted to inquire about the other provision. May I ask the gentleman whether or not his committee considered the question of taking stockbrokers or members of the exchange out of the banking business and forbidding them lending money to their customers, and compelling the customers to either have the cash or go to the banks and get it? Did the committee consider that question?

Mr. RAYBURN. The rules and regulations give wide authority to the administrative body over loans. Stock-exchange brokers cannot lend on unlisted securities, but banks may lend any amount they deem proper.

Mr. McFADDEN. There is no restriction on the brokers borrowing money from the banks and in turn lending to their customers.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is precisely what the margin regulations cover.

We have a liability clause in here covering false and misleading statements. It appeared to us that there ought to be some way of protecting a man against false and misleading statements.

The first provision of the bill as originally written was very much challenged on the ground that reliance should be required. This objection has been met. In other words, if a man bought a security following a prospectus that carried a false or misleading statement, he could not recover from the man who sold to him, nor could the seller be punished criminally, unless the buyer bought the security with knowledge of the statement and relied upon the statement. It seemed to us that this is as little as we could do.

I will proceed to section 18, which deals with powers with respect to exchanges and securities. The Commission is authorized, if in its opinion such action is necessary or appropriate for the protection of investors, after appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, by order, to suspend not only an exchange for a period but to suspend trading in a security on an exchange. In other words, they may force the delisting of the security if the issuer of such security has failed to comply with any provision or the rules and regulations thereunder.

May I say something about the hearings before the Commission? The hearings may be public. There are some issues which will come before the Commission where the people who are being heard would not want open hearings, because it might give away trade secrets that they would not want given out. We have protected in this bill, as far as language can protect, the trade secrets of corporations.

We come to the penalty clause of the bill, which was very drastic in the beginning. The maximum penalty for violation was 10 years' imprisonment, a $25,000 fine, or both.

Of course, I did not think it made a great deal of difference, since this was the maximum penalty and the court could impose such fine or imprisonment as it deemed appropriate to the particular offense. But to show that the committee wanted to take as much of this so-called "fright" out of the bill as possible, we reduced the maximum penalty to a fine of $10,000 or 2 years in prison, and in the case of an exchange, to a fine of not more than $500,000.

All in all, as we believe we will be able to demonstrate under the 5-minute rule in answer to questions and in the discussion of amendments, we have a reasonable bill, one that will not be irksome to any legitimate industry, but will protect the public from conditions that have existed in the past and in the long run will not only help investors and the public in general, but will be a great boon to the stock exchanges themselves and the traders on the stock exchanges.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MAY. I am very much in favor of regulating the stock exchanges and have a great deal of confidence in the information of the chairman of this committee, but I would like to state a concrete proposition that affects my own particular neighborhood and see if it meets the requirements of this legislation. In my district I have an operating coal company that is a $30,000,000 concern with a $6,000,000 defaulted bond issue in receivership. I have another coal company that has a statement involving $8,000,000 with a $35,000,000 bond issue in default and it is also in receivership. I have a gas company that owns a good many leases of gas wells in production and has a default of $4,500,000 of bonds. Under the provisions of this proposed legislation, could these receivers enter into an agreement with the bondholders by which they could refund these bonds by an issue of preferred or common stock, without having to meet the requirements of this legislation? In other words, would they have to list these stocks on the exchanges?

Mr. RAYBURN. If they are not listed stocks, they would not have to do it.

Mr. MAY. If they are not already listed stocks?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; primarily this does not have anything to do with securities except those listed on a national exchange, and the exchange must make application and be granted the right to register them before it comes under the National Securities Act. The commission also has power to regulate the over-the-counter markets, but in so doing they can only regulate the brokers or dealers who create a public market for both the purchase and sale of such securities, and cannot compel corporations not interested in having a public market for their shares to file any statements or submit to any regulation.

Mr. MAY. Then it would not affect small corporations at all who have not such registered stocks?

Mr. RAYBURN. Not at all.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. If the gentleman will permit, the company that the gentleman from Kentucky is speaking of would be affected by this legislation and, as a matter of fact, it ought to be affected, because before they offer such a security to the gullible public, such as the securities of a company that has been in receivership, the public ought to be protected by some sort of law.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think the Securities Act of 1933 is the one to which the gentleman is referring.

Mr. MAY. My question does not have any reference to the gullible public. I am talking about the bondholders of the concern taking stock for it.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Is not this company listed on the New York Stock Exchange?

Mr. MAY. I do not know whether it is or not, but it is a New York corporation.

Mr. RAYBURN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to close, because I am fearfully tired and I would rather answer the questions you are going to ask me under the 5-minute rule, because we are going to have unlimited debate at that time.

I want to wind up what I say here today by repeating what I stated in a radio address when I told the people of the country something about this bill.

The people of this country, I think, are high-minded and honest. I think the vast majority of business in this country is high-minded and honest. I do not think we have to pass restrictive laws for a great deal of business, but I do think that business with a reputation to protect, that over a long period of years has built up a reputation and a good will among the people that is worth a great deal to it, has the right to be protected from the desperadoes who are making it hard on the man who wants to conduct a straightforward and honest business.

I think the people of this country want corruption driven from high places. I think they want and expect their public officials to be clean, and we must not forget, when we are harassed by this propaganda of a few thousands of people, the unnumbered millions throughout this country who have not been articulate in this fight, who have no interests to serve except the common good. They are looking to you and to me as their spokesmen and as their Representatives, not only now but in the future. They want to see this country clean in business and clean in politics, so that the faith and confidence of our people may not be shattered and destroyed, so that under a faith and confidence that are constant and patriotic the institutions of this country, great as they are, may be transmitted to posterity in such a way that those who live at that time can be of the most service to those who live about them. [Applause.] I thank you.

Since the majority report of the committee deals more fully with matters that I have had time only to touch upon, I insert it as part of my remarks.

The report is as follows:

[H.Rept. No. 1383, 73d Cong., 2d sess.]

SECURITIES EXCHANGE BILL OF 1934

Mr. RAYBURN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, submitted the following report to accompany H.R. 9323:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H.R. 9323) to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes, report favorably thereon without amendment, and recommend that the bill do pass.

I. INTRODUCTORY STATEMENT

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE AND LETTER

On February 9, 1934, the President sent the following message to Congress:

"To the Congress:

"In my message to you last March proposing legislation for Federal supervision of national traffic in investment securities I said: 'This is but one step in our broad purpose of protecting investors and depositors. It should be followed by legislation relating to the better supervision of the purchase and sale of all property dealt with on exchanges.'

"This Congress has performed a useful service in regulating the investment business on the part of financial houses and in protecting the investing public in its acquisition of securities.

"There remains the fact, however, that outside the field of legitimate investment naked speculation has been made far too alluring and far too easy for those who could and for those who could not afford to gamble.

"Such speculation has run the scale from the individual who has risked his pay envelop or his meager savings on a margin transaction involving stocks with whose true value he was wholly unfamiliar, to the pool of individuals or corporations with large resources, often not their own, which sought by manipulation to raise or depress market quotations far out of line with reason, all of this resulting in loss to the average investor, who is of necessity personally uninformed.

"The exchanges in many parts of the country which deal in securities and commodities conduct, of course, a national business, because their customers live in every part of the country. The managers of these exchanges have, it is true, often taken steps to correct certain obvious abuses. We must be certain that abuses are eliminated, and to this end a broad policy of national regulation is required.

"It is my belief that exchanges for dealing in securities and commodities are necessary and of definite value to our commercial and agricultural life. Nevertheless, it should be our national policy to restrict, as far as possible, the use of these exchanges for purely speculative operations.

"I, therefore, recommend to the Congress the enactment of legislation providing for the regulation by the Federal Government of the operations of exchanges dealing in securities and commodities for the protection of investors, for the safeguarding of values, and, so far as it may be possible, for the elimination of unnecessary, unwise, and destructive speculation.

"FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

"THE WHITE HOUSE, February 9, 1934."

On March 26, 1934, the President sent the following letter to the chairman of this committee:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 26, 1934.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Chairman Interstate and Foreign Commerce,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Before I leave Washington for a few days' holiday, I want to write you about a matter which gives me some concern.

On February 9, 1934, I sent to the Congress a special message asking for Federal supervision of national traffic in securities.

It has come to my attention that a more definite and more highly organized drive is being made against effective legislation to this end than against any similar recommendation made by me during the past year. Letters and telegrams bearing all the earmarks of origin at some common source are pouring in to the White House and the Congress.

The people of this country are, in overwhelming majority, fully aware of the fact that unregulated speculation in securities and in commodities was one of the most important contributing factors in the artificial and unwarranted "boom" which had so much to do with the terrible conditions of the years following 1929.

I have been definitely committed to definite regulation of exchanges which deal in securities and commodities. In my message I stated, "it should be our national policy to restrict, as far as possible, the use of these exchanges for purely speculative operations."

I am certain that the country as a whole will not be satisfied with legislation unless such legislation has teeth in it. The two principal objectives are, as I see it—

First, the requirement of what is known as margins so high that speculation, even as it exists today, will of necessity be drastically curtailed; and

Second, that the Government be given such definite powers of supervision over exchanges that the Government itself will be able to correct abuses which may arise in the future.

We must, of course, prevent insofar as possible manipulation of prices to the detriment of actual investors, but at the same time we must eliminate unnecessary, unwise, and destructive speculation.

The bill, as shown to me this afternoon by Senator FLETCHER, seems to meet the minimum requirements. I do not see how any of us could afford to have it weakened in any shape, manner, or form.

Very sincerely,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE GENERAL PURPOSES OF THE BILL

To reach the causes of the "unnecessary, unwise, and destructive speculation" condemned by the President's message, this bill seeks to regulate the stock exchanges and the relationships of the investing public to corporations which invite public investment by listing on such exchanges.

The bill is conceived in a spirit of the truest conservatism. It attempts to change the practices of exchanges and the relationships between listed corporations and the investing public to fit modern conditions, for the very purpose that they may endure as essential elements of our economic system. The lesson of 1921-29 is that without changes they cannot endure.

The bill is not a moral pose or a vengeful striking back at brokers for the losses which nearly the entire Nation has suffered in the last 5 years. Nor is its purpose or effect to regiment business in any way. It is simply an earnest attempt to make belated intelligent adjustments, long required by changing conditions, in a faulty system of distributing shares in corporate enterprise among the public—a system which from the coldly objective viewpoint of the welfare of a conservative public simply has not worked. The out-of-date unsuitability to post-war conditions of a whole series of economic interrelationships of which the stock exchanges are the nerve center has uncontrollably accentuated natural moderate fluctuations of our economic system into mad booms and terrible depressions. And such booms and depressions constitute a more real danger to the stability of a moderate, honest, individualistic state than all the unsound theories in the world. This bill seeks to save, not destroy, stock markets and business, by making necessary changes in time.

The fundamental fact behind the necessity for this bill is that the leaders of private business, whether because of inertia, pressure of vested interests, lack of organization, or otherwise, have not since the war been able to act to protect themselves by compelling a continuous and orderly program of change in methods and standards of doing business to match the degree to which the economic system has itself been constantly changing—changing in the proportion of the wealth of the Nation invested in liquid corporate securities traded in on the stock exchanges, changing in the relationship of the distribution of securities and the trading in securities to the balanced utilization of the Nation's credit resources in the financing of agriculture, commerce, and industry. The repetition in the summer of 1933 of the blindness and abuses of 1929 has convinced a patient public that enlightened self-interest in private leadership is not sufficiently powerful to effect the necessary changes alone—that private leadership seeking to make changes must be given Government help and protection.

Since the war the interest of the public at large in the ownership of corporate enterprise has grown bigger, the size of the corporate unit has increased, the diffusion of corporate ownership has widened, all correlatively. Not only is nearly one half of the entire national wealth of the country represented by corporate stocks and corporate and Government bonds, but nearly one half of that corporate wealth is vested in the 200 largest nonbanking corporations which, piercing the thin veil of the holding company and disregarding a relatively few notable exceptions, are owned in each case by thousands of investors and are controlled by those owning only a very small proportion of the corporate stock. Ownership and control are in most cases largely divorced. It is estimated that more than 10,000,000 individual men and women in the United States are the direct possessors of stocks and bonds; that over one fifth of all the corporate stock outstanding in the country is held by individuals with net incomes of less than $5,000 a year. Over 15,000,000 individuals hold insurance policies, the value of which is dependent upon the security holdings of insurance companies. Over 13,000,000 men and women have savings accounts in mutual savings banks and at least 25,000,000 have deposits in national and State banks and trust companies—which are in turn large holders of corporate stocks and bonds.

With this growth in security ownership by the public, the security markets have grown proportionately in importance. Two hundred and thirty-seven million corporate shares were sold on the New York Stock Exchange in 1923; despite the depression, 654,000,000 shares were sold in 1933.

With such concentration of national wealth in the form of liquid corporate securities, the economic machinery of the whole country is now affected by, and is organized primarily to serve, security markets which are as sensitive as a hair trigger. A magnificently organized lending machinery which operates by wire can, with an offer of call-loan safety and 1 percent higher interest, draw funds from local banks which would otherwise seek moderate investment in local business enterprise, to finance the pool of a far-away metropolitan speculator distributing through the stock exchanges the securities of a huge corporate merger designed ultimately to swallow and destroy local enterprise. And there is a demonstrable direct relationship between easy credit for the purchase of new securities in the stock market and the trend toward industrial monopolies so accentuated since the war.

A rise in the security markets stimulates economic activity in all lines of business, a fall in the market precipitates a decline. If the rise in the market is occasioned by an excessive use of credit, a decline in the market loosens a process of deflation which feeds on itself and ruins not only security prices but all business as well. Between 1922 and 1929 brokers' loans increased from 1½ billion dollars to 8½ billion dollars. Five billion dollars of this increase took place in 3 years, 1½ billion dollars in the last 3 months. In the crash of 1929 the same loans declined 3 billion dollars in the first 10 days and 8 billion in the next 3 years. These figures alone will enable the economic historian of the future to describe the unhealthy prosperity of 1929 and the inevitable grief and suffering that followed in the succeeding years—grief and suffering that overwhelmed and carried away not merely the speculative gains of those who participated in the speculative debauch, not merely the savings of the most frugal and most thrifty invested in securities, but eventually the operating profits of every business in the country no matter how unrelated to stock exchanges.

All through these years the machinery of the stock exchanges and of corporate management have only grown bigger without growing different. But this significant growth in size and importance of the exchanges and the business they do with the public has necessitated a real difference in kind in the treatment of that public by the law and by business ethics. Stock exchanges which handle the distribution and trading of a very substantial part of the entire national wealth and which have developed a technique of sucking funds from every corner of the country cannot operate under the same traditions and practices as pre-war stock exchanges which handled substantially only the transactions of professional investors and speculators. And standards of corporate management adequate to inspire investor confidence in the caveat-stockholder era of closely held stockholder-managed companies cannot be stably perpetuated in an era where one company boasts over 700,000 stockholders, and 200 corporations control one half the corporate wealth of the country.

If investor confidence is to come back to the benefit of exchanges and corporations alike, the law must advance. As a complex society so diffuses and differentiates the financial interests of the ordinary citizen that he has to trust others and cannot personally watch the managers of all his interests as one horse trader watches another, it becomes a condition of the very stability of that society that its rules of law and of business practice recognize and protect that ordinary citizen's dependent position. Unless constant extension of the legal conception of a fiduciary relationship—a guarantee of straight shooting—supports the constant extension of mutual confidence which is the foundation of a maturing and complicated economic system, easy liquidity of the resources in which wealth is invested is a danger rather than a prop to the stability of that system. When everything everyone owns can be sold at once, there must be confidence not to sell. Just in proportion as it becomes more liquid and complicated, an economic system must become more moderate, more honest, and more justifiably self-trusting.

When corporations were small, when their managers were intimately acquainted with their owners and when the interests of management and ownership were substantially identical, conditions did not require the regulations of security markers. Even those who in former days managed great corporations were by reason of their personal contacts with their shareholders constantly aware of their responsibilities. But as management became divorced from ownership and came under the control of banking groups, men forgot that they were dealing with the savings of men and the making of profits became an impersonal thing. When men do not know the victims of their aggression they are not always conscious of their wrongs. President Wilson showed a keen prophetic sense when he stated:

"Society cannot afford to have individuals wield the power of thousands without personal responsibility. It cannot afford to let its strongest men be the only men who are inaccessible to the law. Modern democratic society, in particular, cannot afford to constitute its economic undertakings upon the monarchial or aristocratic principle and adopt the fiction that the kings and great men thus set up can do no wrong which will make them personally amenable to the law which restrains smaller men; that their kingdom, not themselves, must suffer for their blindness, their follies, and their transgressions of right."

II. General Analysis of the Bill

Its scope and constitutionality

The causes of dangerous speculation in the securities markets go far deeper than defects and abuses in stock-exchange machinery alone. They include inadequate central control of a national credit system that too easily provides for speculation funds which the national welfare much more requires in local commerce, industry, and agriculture. They include inadequate corporate reporting which keeps in ignorance of necessary factors for intelligent judgment of the values of securities a public continually solicited to buy such securities by the sheer advertising value of listing. They include exploitation of that ignorance by self-perpetuating managements in possession of inside information. Speculation, manipulation, faulty credit control, investors' ignorance, and disregard of trust relationships by those whom the law should regard as fiduciaries, are all a single seamless web. No one of these evils can be isolated for cure of itself alone. A stock-market pool, for instance, is only an effect and not a cause; the manipulator, a shell-game artist who can live only by following the county fair of too easy credit and ignorance.

A bill seeking effectively to control and regulate the securities markets therefore necessarily covers a wide field—necessarily touches more than a few willful speculators of Wall Street, necessarily calls for the cooperation of the wide-spread economic interests which the securities market affects. Business which was engulfed and nearly destroyed by the speculations of 1929 has its contribution to make in the form of fair and informing reports. Banks whose assets were carried away in loans based upon values inflated by reckless speculation must cooperate in permitting coordinated control of the delicate credit system which has been left to their management despite the fact that the Nation has had to expend billions of dollars to insure their solvency.

The factual situation which makes the legislation necessary is set forth in section 2. These recitals of fact—the use of the security markets as interstate markets in which ownership passes from residents of one State to those of another; the constant use of the postal facilities for the conduct of these markets; the abundant use of the credit facilities of national banks and of member banks of the Federal Reserve System; the effect of security prices upon transactions in interstate commerce, upon bank loans, upon taxes, and upon credit available for trade, transportation, and industry—are common knowledge not only among economists but among bankers and business men everywhere. This legislation is not an attempt to reach out and correct the morals of the citizens of any one State; it is an attempt to deal with very vital economic problems going to the root of the functioning of our national credit system.

The constitutional significance of the wide delegation of powers to the Federal Reserve Board and to the Federal Trade Commission, which would administer the act, has been considered with particular care—and the delegation made only with the indication of such maximum standards for discretion as, in the considered judgment of the committee, the technical character of the problems to be dealt with would permit. The bill legislates specifically just as far as the committee feels it can. The original bill submitted to the committee dealt very specifically and definitely with a number of admitted abuses. In many cases, however, the argument was made that while the solutions offered might be correct, their effects were so far-reaching as to make it inadvisable to put these solutions in the form of statutory enactments that could not be changed in case of need without Congressional action. Representatives of the stock exchanges constantly urged a greater degree of flexibility in the statute and insisted that the complicated nature of the problems justified leaving much greater latitude of discretion with the administrative agencies than would otherwise be the case. It is for that reason that the bill in dealing with a number of difficult problems singles out these problems as matters appropriate to be subject to restrictive rules and regulations, but leaves to the administrative agencies the determination of the most appropriate form of rule or regulation to be enforced. In a field where practices constantly vary and where practices legitimate for some purposes may be turned to illegitimate and fraudulent means, broad discretionary powers in the administrative agency have been found practically essential, despite the desire of the committee to limit the discretion of the administrative agencies so far as compatible with workable legislation. It has been represented that the pleas of the representatives of the stock exchanges for the vesting of broad discretionary powers in the administrative agencies have been made with a view to subjecting the bill to constitutional attack at a later date. The committee has, however, taken the pleas in good faith, believing that the nature of the legislation is such as to justify within constitutional limitations that measure of flexibility required in dealing with so intricate a subject matter.

Organization of bill

The chief provisions of the bill may be grouped under six headings: (a) control of credits; (b) control of manipulative practices; (c) provision of adequate and honest reports to securities holders by registered corporations; (d) control of unfair practices of corporate insiders; (e) control of exchanges and over-the-counter markets; (f) administration.

Control of credits

The underlying theory of the bill with respect to control of credit is as follows:

(1) Without adequate control the too strong attraction of a speculative stock market for credit prevents a balanced utilization of the Nation's credit resources in commerce, industry, and agriculture.

(2) To effect such better balance, all speculative credit should be subjected to the central control of the Federal Reserve Board as the most experienced and best equipped credit agency of the Government.

(3) To achieve that control the Federal Reserve Board should be vested with the most effectual and direct power over speculative credit, i.e., the power to control margins on the actual ultimate speculative loans themselves.

(4) Both for the direction and the protection of the Federal Reserve Board in the administration of flexible powers, Congress should offer the Board some definite margin standard to indicate the judgment of Congress that the amount of credit previously routed through the stock markets has been excessive and to indicate the approximate proportion in which such amount should be reduced.

To accomplish these purposes, sections 6 and 7 of the bill gives the Federal Reserve Board power to control speculative credit. The problem of control has been approached from several directions because of the certainty that no purpose of the bill will be more tempting to evasion. Borrowings by brokers to finance their customers are confined to borrowings from or through member banks of the Federal Reserve System or those nonmember banks which apply for a license from the Board. With respect to loans to the ultimate speculating customer, the Board is substantially given power by rules and regulations to fix margins on (a) all loans on securities from brokers to customers, and (b) loans from banks and others to customers made on equity securities and to carry or purchase securities. For the purposes of guiding and protecting the Board from undue speculative pressure in the exercise of its discretion, the bill includes as a standard for the rules and regulations of the Board a limitation of credit on the initial granting of loans to 55 percent of the current market price of the securities offered as collateral, or 100 percent of the lowest market price of the preceding 3 years, whichever is the greater.

To avoid any conceivable deflationary effects upon presently existing loans on securities, all such loans, and renewals and extensions thereof, are exempt from the application of section 6 until January 1, 1939.

The main purpose of these margin provisions in section 6 is not to increase the safety of security loans for lenders. Banks and brokers normally require sufficient collateral to make themselves safe without the help of law. Nor is the main purpose even protection of the small speculator by making it impossible for him to spread himself too thinly—although such a result will be achieved as a byproduct of the main purpose.

The main purpose is to give a Government credit agency an effective method of reducing the aggregate amount of the Nation's credit resources which can be directed by speculation into the stock market and out of other more desirable uses of commerce and industry—to prevent a recurrence of the pre-crash situation where funds which would otherwise have been available at normal interest rates for uses of local commerce, industry, and agriculture, were drained by far higher rates into security loans and the New York call market. Increasing margins—i.e., decreasing the amounts which brokers or banks may lend for the speculative purchase and carrying of stocks—is the most direct and most effective method of discouraging an abnormal attraction of funds into the stock market.

When margins are discussed with this main purpose in mind, differences between the collateral value of gild-edged bonds and speculative stocks, the credit-worthiness of particular borrowers and similar considerations which have been urged as reasons why each loan should be treated as a particular problem in itself—considerations which affect not a general national-credit policy, but only the safety of a particular stock transaction from the standpoint of a particular lender and particular borrower—are unimportant.

Section 6 empowers the Federal Reserve Board to prescribe margins for both brokers and banks on securities registered on exchanges licensed under the bill (hereinafter referred to as "registered securities")—both for the initial opening and for the maintenance or carrying of accounts. The Board is given complete legal authority to fix margins at any point. But a standard is included in the bill as an indication by Congress to the Board that from the standpoint of a general policy of utilization of national credit resources, the Board should control the credit available to the stock market to an amount roughly corresponding to such standard.

To protect margin requirements from evasion, brokers may lend only on listed securities excepting exempted securities. Banks are subject to margin limitations only on loans on registered equity securities in cases where the loan is sought for the purpose of purchasing or carrying securities. The Board is not required to fix the same margins for banks as for brokers and is given a free hand in fixing margins for maintenance as distinguished from margins for the initial opening of accounts.

It has seemed necessary to empower the Board to fix margins for banks as well as for brokers (a) to prevent evasion of restrictions on brokers' margins through loans by banks; (b) to increase the powers of the Board over speculative loans by its member banks; and (c) to give the Board an effective power (it has no powers at present) over speculative loans by nonmember banks.

The margin standard in section 6 has been expressed as a percentage of market value which may be lent upon securities rather than of the amount which the customer is required to deposit at the time of his purchase. The basic loan value provided by the standard for the initial opening of an account is 55 percent of market value of the securities lent upon, i.e., from the standpoint of what the customer must "put up", a 45-percent margin. This standard is not indicated for the purposes of maintenance of the account. The 55-percent loan value indicated would govern in the long run of a rising market. But to afford easier margins for the present market and for a possible future declining market a more favorable alternative standard is indicated in section 6 (a) (2), which, by the finding of Standard Statistics Service, would operate to permit, at the present time, an average initial loan value of 65½ percent of market value on the stocks now listed on the New York Stock Exchange, or, from the customer's point of view, a margin of only 34½ percent.

Under this alternative standard, the margin is only 25 percent in the case of a security that is selling at not more than 33⅓ percent above its 3-year low. As the security increases in price, the margin required gradually increases proportionately until, when the security has reached a price that is more than 80 percent above its 3-year low, a margin of 45 percent is required. This flexible margin standard permits a relatively low margin in the case of stable securities such as bonds, while it requires a higher margin in the case of volatile securities after they have risen substantially in market price. Since the margin increases as the price of the security rises, pyramiding on paper profits is made difficult.

Section 6 seems to furnish a very practical program of controlling the volume of stock-market credit, since it embodies a combination of a basic formula, initially setting minimum margins, with a more general discretionary administrative control, which should be based on the total amount of credit outstanding, the level of stock prices, the phase of the business and financial cycle, and so forth. Between the time when changes are made by the Federal Reserve Board, margin requirements would be automatically raised or lowered by the movements of stock prices. Such a self-adjusting mechanism would probably function better, in actual practice, than any system wherein margin requirements are changed only by deliberate action of the Board and remain unadjusted except when the Board takes such action.

The 55-percent standard expressed in the statute is, however, so deliberately overlenient for the purpose of encouraging the markets at this particular point in the recovery program, that the Board in exercising its discretion would be expected to lower this 55-percent figure considerably after the market reaches more normal levels.

CONTROL OF MANIPULATIVE PRACTICES

To insure to the multitude of investors the maintenance of fair and honest markets, manipulative practices of all kinds on national exchanges are banned. The bill seeks to give to investors markets where prices may be established by the free and honest balancing of investment demand with investment supply. Investors are free to buy and sell virtually without restraint. But wash sales and matched orders and other devices designed to create a misleading appearance of activity with a view to enticing the unwary into the market on the hope of quick gains are definitely prohibited. False and misleading statements designed to induce investors to buy when they should sell and to sell when they should buy are also outlawed and penalized.

But the most subtle manipulating device employed in the security markets is not simply the crude form of a wash sale or a matched order. It is the conscious marking-up of prices to make investors believe that there is a constantly increasing demand for stocks at higher prices, or the conscious marking-down of stocks to make investors believe that an increasing number of investors are selling as prices recede. Legitimate investors desire to buy at as low a price as possible and to sell at as high a price as possible, and honest markets are made by the balancing of investment demand and investment supply.

The provisions concerning manipulative practices have been drawn in light of the results of the recent investigation conducted by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. Despite all the talk of good pools and bad pools, no evidence has been submitted to this committee that would justify the recognition of a good stock-market pool. As the Twentieth Century Fund in its recent report on "Stock Market Control" states—

"As a matter of fact, any pool which seeks to bring about a change in the price of a security through manipulation is 'illegitimate' according to our definition, inasmuch as it thereby lessens the efficiency of an exchange in the performance of those functions which, as we indicated, are the only justification for its existence."

If the pool to "rig" or "jiggle" the market is wrong, it necessarily follows that the market must be purged of reports about activities for the rise or operations for the decline. If brokers and other interested persons are permitted to spread through brokerage and publicity channels constant reports regarding such activities, it is doubtful whether stimulated activity would not accomplish much the same effect as is accomplished by the direct mark-up or mark-down prices by the pool. For that reason the circulation of reports of market operations conducted for a rise or for a decline is prohibited.

The evidence as to the value of pegging and stabilizing operations, particularly in relation to new issues, is far from conclusive. While abuses are undoubtedly associated with such manipulation, because of the desire of the committee to proceed cautiously such operations have not been forbidden altogether, but have been subjected to such control as the administrative commission may find necessary in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

The granting of options to pools and syndicates has been found to be at the bottom of most manipulative operations, because the granting of these options permits large-scale manipulations to be conducted with a minimum of financial risk to the manipulators. The bill, therefore, gives the administrative commission power to regulate dealing in options or trading in options. The connection of pool activity with the option has recently been recognized in the rules of the New York Stock Exchange. As it is not always easy to trace and prove manipulative activity, it is necessary to rid the market of devices which commonly accompany or cloak these activities. Short selling and stop-loss orders, which have been the source of much abuse, are brought within the regulatory power of the administrative commission.

There is plenty of room for legitimate speculation in the balancing of investment demand and supply, in the shrewd prognostication of future trends and economic directions; but the accentuation of temporary fluctuations and the deliberate introduction of a mob psychology into the speculative markets by the fanfare of organized manipulation menace the true functioning of the exchanges, upon which the economic well-being of the whole country depends.

To make effective the prohibitions against manipulation civil redress is given to those able to prove actual damages from any of the prohibited practices.

PROVISION OF ADEQUATE AND HONEST REPORTS TO SECURITIES HOLDERS BY REGISTERED CORPORATIONS

No investor, no speculator, can safely buy and sell securities upon the exchanges without having an intelligent basis for forming his judgment as to the value of the securities he buys or sells. The idea of a free and open public market is built upon the theory that competing judgments of buyers and sellers as to the fair price of a security brings about a situation where the market price reflects as nearly as possible a just price. Just as artificial manipulation tends to upset the true function of an open market, so the hiding and secreting of important information obstruct the operation of the markets as indices of real value. There cannot be honest markets without honest publicity. Manipulation and dishonest practices of the market place thrive upon mystery and secrecy. The disclosure of information materially important to investors may not instantaneously be reflected in market value, but despite the intricacies of security values truth does find relatively quick acceptance on the market. That is why in many cases it is so carefully guarded. Delayed, inaccurate, and misleading reports are the tools of the unconscionable market operator and the recreant corporate official who speculate on inside information. Despite the tug of conflicting interests and the influence of powerful groups, responsible officials of the leading exchanges have unqualifiedly recognized in theory at least the vital importance of true and accurate corporate reporting as an essential cog in the proper functioning of the public exchanges. Their efforts to bring about more adequate and prompt publicity have been handicapped by the lack of legal power and by the failure of certain banking and business groups to appreciate that a business that gathers its capital from the investing public has not the same right to secrecy as a small privately owned and managed business. It is only a few decades since men believed that the disclosure of a balance sheet was a disclosure of a trade secret. Today few people would admit the right of any company to solicit public funds without the disclosure of a balance sheet.

The need of proper and adequate reporting as an adjunct of the proper functioning of the exchanges has been expressed by the realistic and responsible executive assistant of the committee on stock list of the New York Stock Exchange:

"It has been said a hundred times that accounting is a matter of conventions, and it is questionable whether these conventions have kept pace with the changes in modern business conditions. As the art stands today, it appears to the business man to have evolved with primary emphasis upon two objects:

"(a) To give to management that accurate information and aid which are essential to the successful conduct of a business, and (b) to give to actual and prospective creditors that accurate information essential to the determination of the volume of credit which may safely be extended and the conditions under which it may be allowed.

"Under conditions of ownership where the number of partners or stockholders was small, where enterprises were largely managed by their owners, or by the personally chosen representatives of a few owners in close contact with the business, and where it was the custom to finance permanently but little beyond minimum needs and to borrow largely to meet peak needs, accounting adequately performing these two functions probably sufficiently served the needs of the then situation. In the meantime the wide-spread diffusion of corporate ownership, with which we are all familiar, has occurred. There are few large enterprises which have not taken on the corporate form and a large proportion of the total ownership is in the hands of millions of relatively small investors who have no direct contact with management and whose only knowledge of the company is derived from its financial reports. In recent years there has been a marked tendency to finance more or less permanently for peak requirements, becoming lenders of money at the time of minimum requirements, and so tending to lessen the aggregate volume of bank credit needed.

"Because of these changes, coupled with a growing tendency toward extreme broadness and flexibility in the corporation laws of many States, the time appears to have arrived for some changes of emphasis as to the objects to be achieved by sound accounting practice. While there have been able efforts devoted toward this end, the result so far generally attained does not seem to me sufficient to meet the needs. The need of accurate information for the aid of management is still paramount; but, under conditions of today, the next object in order of importance has become 'to give to stockholders, in understandable form, such information in regard to the business as will avoid misleading them in any respect and as will put them in possession of all information needed, and which can be supplied in financial statements, to determine the true value of their investments.'

"This is, of course, the object in which the stock exchange is particularly interested. The primary object of the exchange is to afford facilities for trading in securities under the safest and fairest conditions attainable. In order that parties may trade on even terms they should have, as far as is practicable, the same opportunities for knowledge in regard to the subject matter of the trade.

"The exchange is interested in the accounts of companies as a source of reliable information for those who deal in stocks. It is not sufficient for the stock exchange that the accounts should be in conformity with law or even that they should be conservative; the stock exchange desires that they should be fully and fairly informative."

The president of the New York Stock Exchange has effectively answered those who contend that such publicity will give advantage to competitors:

"The public, today, insists upon more complete and accurate financial statements from publicly owned companies, and I am sure that the officials and directors of these corporations, realizing the reasonableness of this demand, will furnish investors with adequate information. There have not been many instances where the failure to give complete information was due to a desire on the part of directors or officers to secure unfair personal advantage. However, many company officials did not publish complete financial statements because they were afraid that the disclosure of too much information would put their companies at a disadvantage in meeting competition, not only from other American corporations, but frequently from foreign companies engaged in the same line of business. This fear, though genuine, has in large measure proved to be unfounded."

The reporting provisions of the proposed legislation are a very modest beginning to afford that long-denied aid to the exchanges in the way of securing proper information for the investor. The provisions carefully guard against the disclosure of trade secrets or processes. But the idea that a fair report of corporate assets and profits give unfair advantage to competitors is no longer seriously entertained by any modern business man. The realistic corporate executive knows that his alert competitors have a pretty good notion of what his business is; and if he is unable to compete with them, it is because he is hopelessly behind in the keen competitive struggle. The reporting provisions of the legislation have been approved by such conservative investment services as Moody's and Standard Statistics, and, despite the wild fears spread throughout the country by powerful lobbyists against this bill, intelligent business men recognize that general knowledge of business facts will only help and cannot hurt them. The possession of these facts has for a number of years been the exclusive perquisite of powerful banking and industrial groups. Making these facts generally available will be of material benefit and guidance to business as a whole.

CONTROL OF UNFAIR PRACTICES BY CORPORATE INSIDERS

A renewal of investors' confidence in the exchange markets can be effected only by a clearer recognition upon the part of the corporate managers of companies whose securities are publicly held of their responsibilities as trustees for their corporations. Men charged with the administration of other people's money must not use inside information for their own advantage. Because it is difficult to draw a clear line as a matter of law between truly inside information and information generally known by the better-informed investors, the most potent weapon against the abuse of inside information is full and prompt publicity. For that reason, this bill requires the disclosure of the corporate holdings of officers and directors and stockholders owning more than 5 percent of any class of stock, and prompt disclosure of any changes that occur in their corporate holdings. Short selling and selling against the box by insiders are prohibited. These provisions have been called the "anti-Wiggin provisions" of the bill. The committee is aware that these requirements are not airtight and that the unscrupulous insider may still, within the law, use inside information for his own advantage. It is hoped, however, that the publicity features of the bill will tend to bring these practices into disrepute and encourage the voluntary maintenance of proper fiduciary standards by those in control of large corporate enterprises whose securities are registered on the public exchanges.

Fair corporate suffrage is an important right that should attach to every equity security bought on a public exchange. Managements of properties owned by the investing public should not be permitted to perpetuate themselves by the misuse of corporate proxies. Insiders having little or no substantial interest in the properties they manage have often retained their control without an adequate disclosure of their interest and without an adequate explanation of the management policies they intend to pursue. Insiders have at times solicited proxies without fairly informing the stockholders of the purposes for which the proxies are to be used and have used such proxies to take from the stockholders for their own selfish advantage valuable property rights. Inasmuch as only the exchanges make it possible for securities to be widely distributed among the investing public, it follows as a corollary that the use of the exchanges should involve a corresponding duty of, according to shareholders, fair suffrage. For this reason the proposed bill gives the Federal Trade Commission power to control the conditions under which proxies may be solicited with a view to preventing the recurrence of abuses which have frustrated the free exercise of the voting rights of stockholders.

CONTROL OF THE EXCHANGES AND OVER-THE-COUNTER MARKETS

The importance of the actual workings of the exchanges themselves, although great, should not be exaggerated. The stronger and more subtle economic forces affecting speculation come from without the exchanges. But as this speculation converges upon the exchanges, the control of the exchange mechanism is a necessary part of any effective regulation. It is for that reason that the bill gives the Federal Trade Commission broad powers over the exchanges to insure their efficient and honest functioning. Theoretically floor trading has been assumed to be of value in stabilizing prices and preventing undue fluctuations. The studies conducted by the special counsel for the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency have thrown considerable doubt upon the value of floor trading. The large floor traders seldom stem the tide but run with it. Their activity tends to accentuate the moves of the market and to stimulate undue speculation. The importance of active, constant trading can readily be exaggerated. A relatively stable market over a period is of much greater importance to investors than a fictitiously stable market that involves no more than one eighth of a point spread between sales but results in wide fluctuations over days or weeks. The market's liquidity depends upon its relative stability and not upon the spreads between momentary sales. To prevent the artificial stimulation of the market that comes from excessive speculative trading unrelated to investment, the Commission is given power to regulate and, if need be, prevent floor trading. The Commission is further given power to prevent excessive trading by members off the floor who at times are tempted to stimulate the market by numerous in-and-out transactions which cost them nothing more than the nominal commissions paid to the $2 brokers.

No issue has been more disputed than that centering about the functions of the specialist. There are many who believe that the exchange mechanism would function better without the specialist, that the work done by the specialist could be done more effectively by a clerk or official of the exchange clearing the orders in a purely mechanical way, much as they are cleared today on the New York Stock Exchange in the "bond crowd." There are others who believe that a specialist should be obliged to act either as a dealer or as a broker and should not be permitted to combine the functions of dealer and broker. The jobber on the London Stock Exchange is essentially a dealer-specialist who deals only with other jobbers and with brokers, and does not act as a broker himself or deal with the public directly. It is generally admitted that there are serious abuses in connection with the work of specialists. The New York Stock Exchange tightened its rules in regard to specialists on the very eve of the hearings held by the committee. It is true that some of the worst evils associated with the specialist have centered around their participation in pools, but there are inherent difficulties in the situation where under normal circumstances the available orders are known to the specialist only—and perhaps his favored friends—and not to everyone dealing in the security involved. Inasmuch as the stock exchanges objected to the laying down of any statutory rule governing specialists, their suggestion has been adopted of giving the Commission effective power to control the activities of specialists and to experiment with various devices of control.

Another perplexing problem in regard to the working of the exchanges has been that centering about the dealer-broker relationship. There is an inherent inconsistency in a man's acting both as a broker and a dealer. It is difficult to serve two masters. And it is particularly difficult to give impartial advice to a client if the dealer-broker has his own securities to sell, particularly when they are new securities for which there is no ready market. The combination of the functions of dealer and broker has persisted over a long period of time in American investment banking, and it was found difficult to break up this relationship at a time when the dealer business was in the doldrums and when it was feared that the bulk of the dealer-brokers would, if compelled to choose, give up their dealer business and leave, temporarily at least, an impaired mechanism for the distribution of new securities. Consequently, it was deemed impracticable at this time to do more than require the dealer-broker to disclose to his customer the capacity in which he was acting and to refrain from taking into margin accounts new securities in the distribution of which he had participated during the preceding 6 months.

The bill proceeds on the theory that the exchanges are public institutions which the public is invited to use for the purchase and sale of securities listed thereon and are not private clubs to be conducted only in accordance with the interests of their members. The great exchanges of this country upon which millions of dollars of securities are sold are affected with a public interest in the same degree as any other great utility. The Commission is empowered, if the rules of the exchange in any important matter are not appropriate for the protection of investors or appropriate to insure fair dealing, to order such changes in the rules after due notice and hearings as it may deem necessary. The exchanges may alter their rules if more effective means are discovered to meet the same or new problems. Although a wide measure of initiative and responsibility is left with the exchanges, reserved control is in the Commission if the exchanges do not meet their responsibility. It is hoped that the effect of the bill will be to give to the well-managed exchanges that power necessary to enable them to effect themselves needed reforms and that the occasion for direct action by the Commission will not arise.

The committee has been convinced that effective regulation of the exchanges requires as a corollary a measure of control over the over-the-counter markets. The problem is clearly put in the recent report of the Twentieth Century Fund on Stock Market Control:

"The benefits that would accrue as the result of raising the standards of security exchanges might be nullified if the over-the-counter markets were left unregulated and uncontrolled. They are of vast proportions, and they would serve as a refuge for any business that might seek to escape the discipline of the exchanges; and the more exacting that discipline, the greater the temptation to escape from it. Over-the-counter markets offer facilities that are useful under certain conditions, but they should not be permitted to expand beyond their proper sphere and compete with the exchanges for business that, from the point of view of public interest, should be confined to the organized markets. This constitutes the sanction for Federal regulation of over-the-counter dealers and brokers. To leave the over-the-counter markets out of a regulatory system would be to destroy the effects of regulating the organized exchanges."

ADMINISTRATION

The bill places the administration of the legislation, apart from credit phases, in the Federal Trade Commission. It provides, however, for the enlargement of that Commission by two members and the creation within it of a special division which will administer both this bill and the Securities Act of 1933. Unquestionably these two measures are so closely related that they should be administered by the same body, and unquestionably if no new commission were to be appointed that administration should be lodged in the Federal Trade Commission, which has so ably organized the administration of the Securities Act of 1933.

Insofar as the proposals of the stock exchanges suggest a separate stock-exchange authority, it should be kept in mind that the name by which the body administering the act is known is not important. The legislative essentials are the same whether the body is called an "authority" or a "board" or a "Federal commission." Those essentials are how much power the administrative body shall have and whether it shall be made up entirely of representatives of none but the public interest, or of expert representatives, as such, of stock exchanges and of other distinct classes in the community.

Insofar as experts are concerned, it is a commonplace of administrative statesmanship that boards of men who are experts in details rarely agree among themselves, and in their very expertness with the trees seldom perceive the woods of broad public policy. The well-learned lesson of democratic government with experts is that they should be kept on tap but not on top.

Insofar as making up a permanent Government regulatory body from representatives of special vested interests is concerned, it has been long ago learned that no harmony of policy can result from a regulatory body packed with advocates of warring interests and that the inevitable result of placing on a regulatory authority able advocates who have at heart the definite interest of a particular class which will profit by the least possible regulation is stultification of the regulation.

III. ANALYSIS OF THE BILL BY SECTIONS

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE

This section provides that the act may be cited as the "National Securities Exchange Act of 1934."

SECTION 2. THE NECESSITY FOR REGULATION AS PROVIDED IN THIS ACT

The purpose of this section is to indicate the facts which give rise to the necessity for the legislation and justify the exercise of congressional power. The evidence submitted to the committee, together with that produced before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee during its recent extensive investigation and facts that have become common knowledge during the national economic crisis of the past few years, abundantly justify the findings recited in this section.

SECTION 3. DEFINITIONS AND APPLICATION OF ACT

(a) This subsection defines the terms used in the act. Most of these definitions are self-explanatory. Banks are expressly exempted from the definitions of "broker" and "dealer." The definition of "bank" in paragraph (6) includes banks organized under the laws of the United States, members of the Federal Reserve System, and any other bank performing the normal functions of receiving deposits or exercising fiduciary powers and which is subject to supervision and examination by State or Federal authorities. In paragraph (10) the words "oil, gas, or other" have been stricken out of that part of the definition of "security", as it appeared in earlier prints of the bill, which included any "certificate of interest or participation in any profit-sharing agreement or in any oil, gas, or other mineral royalty or lease." From the use of the words "other mineral royalty or lease" in the earlier print it is clear that an oil or gas royalty or lease was considered to be one kind of mineral royalty or lease, and thus no actual change is made by striking out the words indicated above. An "exempted security" is defined in paragraph (12) to include certain specified classes of securities. In addition, the Secretary of the Treasury may designate for exemption the securities of corporations in which the United States has a direct or indirect interest; and the Federal Trade Commission (elsewhere referred to as the "Commission") is given power to place in the category of "exempted securities" any other securities (including unregistered securities the market in which is predominantly intrastate) where it deems such action necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors. A large number of the provisions in the act expressly exclude "exempted securities." Thus the Commission is able to remove from the operation of any one or more of these provisions any securities as to which it deems them inappropriate. It may attach such conditions as to such exemption as it deems desirable. The Commission may therefore make appropriate exemptions for the protection of the holders of defaulted securities and foreign securities if the issuers refuse to register.

(b) The Commission and the Federal Reserve Board are given power to define accounting, technical, and trade terms.

(c) The act is not to apply to instrumentalities and agencies of the United States, except where they are specifically included.

SECTION 4. TRANSACTIONS ON UNREGISTERED EXCHANGES

This section forbids the use of the mails and interstate commerce to any exchange which is not registered as a national securities exchange under section 5, but authorizes the Commission to exempt from this prohibition small exchanges as to which it finds that registration would be impracticable and unnecessary in the public interest or for the protection of investors. Such exemption may be withdrawn under stated circumstances.

SECTION 5. REGISTRATION OF NATIONAL SECURITIES EXCHANGES

Subsection (a) provides for registration as a national securities exchange upon application by any exchange which agrees to comply, and to require its members to comply, with the act and the rules and regulations thereunder, and which furnishes the Commission with required information.

An exchange desiring registration is required by subsection (b) to provide for the disciplining of members who are guilty of conduct inconsistent with just and equitable principles of trade, and must include in this category any willful violation of the act or any rule or regulation thereunder.

It is provided in subsection (c) that exchanges may adopt any rules not inconsistent with the act or the rules and regulations thereunder or the laws of the State in which it is located.

Subsection (d) directs the Commission to grant an application for registration if it appears that the exchange is so organized as to be able to comply with the act and rules and regulations thereunder and to insure fair dealing and the protection of investors.

Subsection (e) provides that the Commission's order granting or denying an application for registration shall be made within 30 days unless the application has been withdrawn.

Subsection (f) permits an exchange to withdraw its registration upon such terms as the Commission may deem necessary for the protection of investors.

SECTION 6. MARGIN REQUIREMENTS

The Federal Reserve Board is directed by subsection (a) to prescribe by rules and regulations the maximum amount of credit which may be extended and maintained on any security (other than an exempted security) which is registered on a national securities exchange. As far as the initial extension of credit is concerned it is indicated by the act that this should be based on a standard of 55 percent of the current market price of the security or 100 percent of its lowest market price during the preceding 36 calendar months, but in no case more than 75 percent of the current market price. Until July 1, 1936, the lowest price on or after July 1, 1933, is to be considered as the lowest price during the preceding 36 calendar months. Matters of detail concerning the maintenance of margins, substitutions, additional purchases, withdrawals, and transfers of accounts are left to be determined by the Board, which is also given power to prescribe regulations with regard to margins in the case of delayed deliveries, short sales, arbitrage transactions, securities which have not been on the market for 36 months, and similar matters of administrative adjustment.

Under subsection (b) the Federal Reserve Board may depart from the standard indicated in subsection (a) for the initial extension of credit by (1) lowering margin requirements insofar as it deems necessary for the accommodation of commerce and industry, having due regard to the general credit situation, and (2) prescribing such higher margin requirements as it may deem necessary or appropriate to prevent the excessive use of credit to finance speculative transactions in securities. Thus the effect is to make the margin provisions of the act completely elastic, giving the Federal Reserve Board discretion, but at the same time indicating a standard to which it is to adhere except under the circumstances indicated.

Subsection (c) makes it unlawful for a member of a national securities exchange or a broker or dealer who does business through such a member to extend or maintain credit in violation of the regulations prescribed under subsections (a) and (b), or without collateral or on collateral other than an exempted security or a security registered upon a national securities exchange, except insofar as this is permitted by rules and regulations of the Federal Reserve Board where such use of credit is not for the purpose of purchasing or carrying securities or of evading the margin requirements for registered securities.

Subsection (d) authorizes the Board to make rules and regulations so far as may be necessary to prevent evasion of this section through loans from persons who are not covered by subsection (c) and permits the imposition, upon loans made for the purchasing or carrying of registered securities, of limitations similar to those which may be imposed upon members, brokers, and dealers. It is expressly provided that such regulations shall not apply to loans not made in the course of business (such as purely personal loans), to loans on exempted securities, to loans to aid dealers in the distribution of securities not through the medium of a national securities exchange, to bank loans on any security other than an equity security or to such other loans as the Board may deem it necessary or appropriate to exempt. (An equity security is defined in sec. 3 (a) (11), and is, to speak generally, a stock or a security convertible into a security similar thereto.)

Subsection (e) makes the provisions of this entire section inapplicable to credit outstanding at the effective date of the act until January 31, 1939. This is designed to prevent forced liquidation.

SECTION 7. RESTRICTIONS ON BORROWING BY MEMBERS, BROKERS, AND DEALERS

By subsection (a), borrowing on registered securities (other than exempted securities) by members, brokers, and dealers who do a business through members is confined to loans from member banks of the Federal Reserve System or from nonmember banks which agree to comply with the provisions of this act, the Federal Reserve Act, and the Banking Act of 1933, insofar as they relate to the use of credit to finance transactions in securities. This, however, is subject to certain exceptions in case of transactions between members, brokers, and dealers and in emergency cases.

Subsection (b) prohibits a member, broker, or dealer to permit his indebtedness (except on exempted securities) in the ordinary course of business as a broker to exceed 2,000 percent of his net capital or such lower percentage thereof as the commission may prescribe.

A broker is forbidden by subsection (c) to commingle the securities of customers without their written consent; and by subsection (d) regardless of such consent to pledge customers' securities with those of persons who are not customers or under circumstances that will subject customers' securities to a lien in excess of the aggregate indebtedness of the customers. This means that a broker cannot risk the securities of his customers to finance his own speculative operations. He is also forbidden by subsection (e) to lend a customer's securities without the latter's written consent.

SECTION 8. PROHIBITION AGAINST MANIPULATION OF SECURITY PRICES

Subsection (a) makes it unlawful for any person to use the mails, or interstate commerce, or any facility of a national securities exchange, or for any member of a national securities exchange by use of any means, to participate in certain practices in connection with securities registered on a national securities exchange.

Under paragraph (1) of this subsection it is made unlawful for the purpose of creating a misleading appearance as to the real nature of the market or activity of trading in the security, (A) to effect any transaction which involves no change in the beneficial ownership of the security, or (B) to enter orders for the purchase of a security with the knowledge that orders of substantially the same size, at substantially the same time and at substantially the same price, for the sale of such security will be entered by or for the same or different parties, or (C) to enter orders for the sale of a security with the knowledge of orders of substantially the same size, at substantially the same time and at substantially the same price, for the purchase of such security, will be entered for the same by or for the same or different parties. These provisions strike at wash sales and matched orders.

Paragraph (2) makes it unlawful to effect any series of transactions in a security for the purpose of raising or depressing the price of such security. Of course, any extensive purchases or sales are bound to cause changes in the market price of the security. If a person is merely trying to acquire a large block of stock for investment, or desires to dispose of a big holding, his knowledge that in doing so he will affect the market price does not make his action unlawful. His transactions become unlawful only when they are made for the purpose of raising or depressing the market price. This provision catches the rigging and jiggling of the market, and prevents the marking up or down of prices by pools.

Inducing the sale or purchase of securities by the making of a false or misleading statement of a material fact is outlawed by paragraph (4), unless the person making the statement had no reason to believe the statement was false or misleading.

Paragraphs (3) and (5) make it unlawful to induce the purchase or sale of a security by circulating in the ordinary course of business or for a consideration information that a security will change in price as a result of market operations for a rise or fall. These provisions are aimed at the tipster sheet and the practice of customer's men in inducing customers to buy or sell by spreading rumors with regard to the operations of pools.

The pegging of security prices is regulated by paragraph (6). Many experts are of the opinion that the artificial stabilization of a security at a given price serves no useful economic function. On the other hand the practice has been wide-spread on the part of many investment bankers who regard it legitimate, particularly if the public is aware of the plan. Instead of being prohibited, therefore, this practice is left to such regulation by the Commission as it may deem necessary for the prevention of activities detrimental to the interests of investors.

Subsection (b) is concerned with the use of options in connection with transactions on national securities exchanges. Options and trading against options are the usual concomitants of pool operations. Inasmuch, however, as it has been urged that all options are not affected with the manipulative taint it is made unlawful to trade in or against options only when in violation of such rules and regulations as the Commission may deem necessary in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

Subsection (c) empowers the Commission to make regulations regarding the guaranteeing of options for registered securities by members of national security exchanges.

Subsection (d) makes it clear that the options to be regulated under subsections (b) and (c), which include so-called "puts", "calls", "straddles", and "privileges"—which are commonly used for manipulative and speculative purposes—do not include duly registered warrants or rights to subscribe to a security or the right of the holder of a registered convertible security to have it converted.

Subsection (e) provides that persons who willfully participate in the manipulative or speculative practices which are forbidden by subsections (a), (b), and (c) shall be liable for the damages they cause to innocent investors who have bought or sold the security in question at a price which has been effected by such unlawful practices. A defendant may recover contribution from any other participant in the illegal transactions who would have been liable if sued jointly. Suits for recovery under this subsection must be commenced within 3 years after the violation.

Subsection (f) exempts from the operation of this section all exempted securities.

SECTION 9. REGULATION OF THE USE OF MANIPULATIVE DEVICES

This section makes it unlawful to use the mails or interstate commerce or any facility of a national securities exchange to effect a short sale of, or to employ any stop-loss order in connection with a transaction in, a registered security in contravention of the regulations of the Commission.

SECTION 10. SEGREGATION AND LIMITATION OF FUNCTIONS OF MEMBERS, BROKERS, AND DEALERS

Subsection (a) directs the Commission to regulate or prevent, by rules and regulations, floor trading on the part of members. By this means those who are actually on the scene of speculation may be restricted from taking undue advantage of this privilege. The Commission is also directed by rules and regulations to prevent such excessive speculation on the part of members who operate from off the floor as it may deem detrimental to the maintenance of a fair and orderly market. The Commission may make such exemptions as are necessary or appropriate in the case of exempted securities, arbitrage transactions, and transactions by odd-lot dealers and specialists.

Subsection (b) authorizes the registration of members as odd-lot dealers or specialists, or both, pursuant to the rules of the exchange, and subject to rules and regulations of the Commission. The odd-lot dealer may be permitted to deal for his own account only so far as necessary in the performance of his particular function. The Commission is directed to limit the specialist in his dealings for his own account to those which are necessary for the maintenance of a fair and orderly market. The specialist is forbidden to reveal the orders on his books to favored persons. This information must be available to all members or else kept confidential. The specialist is likewise prohibited from exercising purely discretionary orders as distinct from market or limited price orders.

Subsection (c) authorizes the Commission to exempt small exchanges from the provisions of this section. This will prevent hardship on those exchanges where the functions of members are not as highly specialized as on the larger markets. Provision is made for withdrawing the exemption in proper cases.

Subsection (d) provides that any member, or any person doing business through a member, who acts both as a broker and dealer shall not use the mails, or interstate commerce, or any national securities exchange to effect any transaction which involves purchasing for a customer on margin, or selling to him on margin, any security which the broker or dealer has been engaged in distributing within 6 months. This strikes at one of the greatest potential evils inherent in the combination of the broker and dealer function in the same person, by assuring that he will not induce his customers to buy on credit securities which he has undertaken to distribute to the public. A broker-dealer must also reveal to his customers whether he acts as principal or as agent, in order that the customer may be aware of any factors tending to influence the broker's advice.

Subsection (e) directs the Commission to investigate and report to Congress by January 3, 1936, on the question of completely segregating the activities of brokers and dealers.

SECTION 11. REGISTRATION REQUIREMENTS FOR SECURITIES

Subsection (a) prohibits members, brokers, and dealers from effecting any transaction on a national securities exchange in any security which is not exempted or registered under the provisions of this act.

The application to be filed by the issuer of a security with the exchange and with the Commission as a prerequisite to registration is described in subsection (b).

In paragraph (1) is indicated the information which the Commission may require an issuer to file in its application for registration. These provisions are self-explanatory.

Under paragraph (2) various documents, such as articles of incorporation, bylaws, and underwriting arrangements, may be called for.

Subsection (c) authorizes the Commission, if it deems any of the information specified under subsection (b) to be inappropriate in a given case or class of cases, to require in lieu thereof the submission of appropriate information of a comparable character. This assures adequate elasticity without giving the Commission unconfined authority to elicit any information whatsoever.

If an exchange approves the registration of a security and so certifies to the Commission, the registration becomes effective within 30 days under subsection (d), subject, however, to the provisions of section 18. An issuer may cancel its registration at any time subject to such conditions as the Commission may prescribe as necessary for the protection of investors. Registration of unissued securities for trading on a "when, as, and if issued" basis is permitted subject to regulations of the Commission in cases where the registration is not primarily designed to distribute the security to investors other than the present security holders of the company. This permits the creation of an adequate market in which the holders of rights to unissued securities may trade them as against the value of the unissued securities. At the same time the Commission will be able to prevent the practice of running up the price of a security prior to its issuance, so that it is finally issued at an excessive price.

In order to preclude congestion during the period when the act first comes into force, subsection (e) would permit the provisional registration of securities already listed on exchanges without compliance with the registration requirements set forth in this section. Such registrations may be effective until July 1, 1935, by which date there should be more than adequate time for formal registration.

Subsection (f) provides that unlisted trading (the practice of admitting securities to trade upon the application of a member of the exchange and without any action on the part of the corporation) shall be permitted by the rules and regulations of the Commission until July 1, 1935, in securities admitted to unlisted trading before March 1, 1934. Such securities are to be regarded as registered securities, except that they are exempt from the requirements of sections 11, 12, and 15, but in quoting transactions exchanges must specify the securities which are admitted merely to unlisted trading.

SECTION 12. PERIODICAL AND OTHER REPORTS

Subsection (a) requires the issuers of registered securities to keep the information filed under section 11 reasonably up to date and to make annual reports, certified by independent public accountants if the Commission deems this necessary, and such quarterly reports as may be deemed essential.

Subsection (b) permits the Commission to specify the form in which reports shall be made, the details to be shown in financial statements, and the methods to be followed in calculating the items indicated in their preparation. The purpose is to give some assurance that reports will not hide the true condition of the company. In the case of the reports of any person whose accounting is subject to the provisions of any law of the United States or of any State, the rules and regulations of the Commission imposing requirements with respect to reports are not to be inconsistent with the requirements imposed by such law; but if the Commission believes that such requirements are inadequate from the point of view of the investor, it may impose additional requirements. In other words, while the act carefully avoids unnecessary duplication of reports, it permits the Commission to require the reporting of all matters regarded as essential under the act for the protection of investors.

SECTION 13. PROXIES

Subsection (a) prohibits the solicitation of proxies in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe in the interest of the issuer and its security holders.

By subsection (b) it is made unlawful for a member of a national securities exchange or a broker or dealer who transacts a business in securities through a member to give proxies with respect to securities carried for a customer in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe for the protection of investors.

SECTION 14. OVER-THE-COUNTER MARKETS

The use of the mails and interstate commerce for the creation of markets, other than regular exchanges, is made the basis for such regulation of these markets as the Commission may find to be necessary or appropriate to insure to investors protection comparable to that which is accorded in the case of registered exchanges under the act. Such rules and regulations may include provision for the registration of brokers and dealers and of the securities traded. Securities already traded in on exchanges at the time the act becomes effective may be subjected to special regulation if they do not become registered under section 11. This will enable the Commission to distinguish between the securities of the type normally subject to speculative and manipulative abuse and those not customarily bought or sold on exchanges.

SECTION 15. DIRECTORS, OFFICERS, AND PRINCIPAL STOCKHOLDERS

Under subsection (a) directors and officers of the issuer of a registered equity security (other than an exempted security) and holders of more than 5 percent of any class of a registered equity security (other than an exempted security), are required at the time of registration to file with the Commission a list of their holdings of the issuer's securities and to file monthly reports of their dealings in such securities. This is to give investors an idea of the purchases and sales by insiders which may in turn indicate their private opinion as to prospects of the company.

By subsection (b) directors, officers, and principal security holders are forbidden to sell registered securities (other than exempted securities) short or to sell for delivery after 20 days. The latter provision is for the purpose of preventing sales against the box whereby those in possession of inside information sell their holdings but keep the stock registered in their name, so that their change of position does not become known until delivery is made at a later date.

SECTION 16. ACCOUNTS AND RECORDS, REPORTS, EXAMINATION OF EXCHANGES, MEMBERS, AND OTHERS

By subsection (a) national securities exchanges, their members, and brokers and dealers who do business through them, as well as brokers and dealers who maintain over-the-counter markets, are required to keep such records as the Commission may prescribe in the public interest or for the protection of investors. These records shall be open to reasonable inspection by the Commission.

Subsection (b) gives the Federal Reserve Board necessary powers as to reports and examinations in connection with the exercise of its functions under the act.

SECTION 17. LIABILITY FOR MISLEADING STATEMENTS

Subsection (a) provides that any person who makes or causes to be made any statement in an application, report, or document, which is false or misleading as to a material fact, shall be liable to a person who in reliance on the statement and in ignorance of its false or misleading character has purchased the security to which it relates at a price affected by it, unless the person sued proved that he acted in good faith without knowledge of the false and misleading character of the statement.

Subsection (b) provides for contribution between persons who would be liable to be sued jointly, and subsection (c) limits the time for bringing a suit to 3 years after the violation.

SECTION 18. POWERS WITH RESPECT TO EXCHANGES AND SECURITIES

Subsection (a) authorizes the Commission, when it deems such action necessary—(1) to suspend or withdraw registration of an exchange which the Commission finds has violated the act or the rules and regulations thereunder or has failed to take adequate steps to enforce compliance therewith by its members, (2) to deny, postpone, suspend, or withdraw the registration of the security in case of violation by the issuer, (3) to suspend or expel a member or officer of an exchange who is guilty of a violation or of aiding a violation by acting as broker for a person whom he has reason to believe is engaged in a violation, and (4) summarily to suspend trade in any registered security for a period not exceeding 10 days or, with the approval of the President of the United States, summarily to suspend all trade on a registered exchange for not more than 90 days. Orders issued pursuant to (1), (2), and (3) must be preceded by appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing; action under (4) is of an emergency nature and therefore limited in time.

Subsection (b) authorizes the Commission to amend the rules of an exchange in certain particulars by rules and regulations, after the exchange has failed to comply with the Commission's written request for such amendment of the rules of the exchange as the Commission deems necessary or appropriate for the protection of investors or to insure fair dealing or administration of the exchange.

SECTION 19. LIABILITIES OF CONTROLLING PERSONS

By subsection (a) a person who controls a person subject to the act or a rule or regulation thereunder is made liable to the same extent as the person controlled unless the controlling person acted in good faith and did not induce the act in question.

Subsection (b) makes it unlawful for any person to do, through any other person, anything that he is forbidden to do himself.

Subsection (c) makes it unlawful for a director, officer, or security owner, without just cause, to hinder, delay, or obstruct the making of reports required of an issuer under this act.

In this section and in section 11, when reference is made to "control", the term is intended to include actual control as well as what has been called legally enforceable control. (See Handy & Harmon v. Burnet (1931) 284 U.S. 136.) It was thought undesirable to attempt to define the term. It would be difficult if not impossible to enumerate or to anticipate the many ways in which actual control may be exerted. A few examples of the methods used are stock ownership, lease, contract, and agency. It is well known that actual control sometimes may be exerted through ownership of much less than a majority of the stock of a corporation either by the ownership of such stock alone or through such ownership in combination with other factors.

SECTION 20. INVESTIGATIONS; INJUNCTIONS AND PROSECUTION OF OFFENSES

(a) The Commission is authorized to investigate violations of the act. The Commission is further authorized to investigate and to publish information concerning any facts, conditions, practices, or matters which it may deem necessary or appropriate to aid in the enforcement of the act or in prescribing rules and regulations.

(b) The Commission is authorized through its members, or officers designated by it, to administer oaths and affirmations, subpena witnesses, compel their attendance, and require the production of books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, and other records.

(c) This subsection relates to compelling attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of evidence.

(d) This subsection is similar to one contained in the Federal Trade Commission Act, and provides that no person shall be excused from attending and testifying, but relieves any natural person from prosecution with respect to or on account of any matter concerning which he may testify or produce evidence.

(e) The Commission is authorized to seek the aid of the United States district courts to enjoin acts or practices in violation of the provisions of the act or rules and regulations.

(f) The district courts of the United States are given jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus commanding any person to comply with the provisions of the act or any order made thereunder.

SECTION 21. HEARINGS BY COMMISSION

This section provides that hearings of the Commission may be public and may be held before the Commission or any member or members thereof or any designated officer or officers and requires that appropriate records of hearings shall be kept.

SECTION 22. RULES AND REGULATIONS; ANNUAL REPORTS

(a) The Commission and the Federal Reserve Board, respectively, are authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the execution of the functions granted to them under the act and are authorized for such purposes to classify issuers, securities, exchanges, and other persons or matters.

(b) The Commission and the Federal Reserve Board are directed to include in their annual reports to Congress such information and such recommendations for further legislation as they may deem advisable relating to the matters within their respective jurisdictions under the act.

SECTION 23. INFORMATION FILED WITH THE COMMISSION

(a) This subsection makes it clear that no person is to be required to reveal trade secrets or processes in applications, reports, or other documents.

(b) Any person filing information may object in writing to the public disclosure thereof, and the Commission is authorized to hear objections when it deems it advisable. In cases where objections are made the Commission is not to make the information public unless in its judgment disclosure thereof is in the public interest.

(c) It is made unlawful for any member, officer, or employee of the Commission to make disclosure of information which is not made available to the public as authorized in subsection (b).

SECTION 24. COURT REVIEW OF ORDERS

(a) This section relates to review by United States Circuit Courts of Appeal of orders of the Commission on the petition of any person aggrieved. On such review the court is to have exclusive jurisdiction to affirm, modify, and enforce or set aside the order, in whole or in part. Findings of fact by the Commission are to be conclusive if supported by substantial evidence. The judgment and decree of the court is to be final subject to review by the Supreme Court in accordance with sections 239 and 240 of the Judicial Code.

(b) The commencement of proceedings under subsection (a) is not to operate as a stay of the Commission's order unless the court so orders.

SECTION 25. UNLAWFUL REPRESENTATIONS

No action or failure to act by the Commission or Federal Reserve Board is to be construed to indicate approval of any security or transaction or to indicate a finding that any statement or report is true and accurate or not false or misleading. It is declared to be unlawful to make any representation that any such action or failure to act is to be so construed or has such effect.

SECTION 26. JURISDICTION OF OFFENSES AND SUITS

The district courts of the United States, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and the United States courts of any Territory or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States are given jurisdiction of violations of the act and of rules and regulations thereunder, and of suits in equity and actions at law brought to enforce any liability or duty created by the act or by the rules and regulations thereunder.

SECTION 27. EFFECT ON EXISTING LAW

(a) This subsection reserves rights and remedies existing outside of those provided in the act, but limits the total amount recoverable to the amount of actual damages. It provides that the jurisdiction of State commissions shall not be affected insofar as it does not conflict with the provisions of the act or the rules and regulations thereunder.

(b) It is provided that nothing in the act shall be construed to modify existing law with regard to certain relationships between exchanges and their members.

SECTION 28. VALIDITY OF CONTRACTS

(a) This subsection declares void any condition or stipulation requiring any person to waive compliance with any provision of the act or any rule or regulation thereunder or any rule of exchange.

(b) This subsection declares void contracts made in violation of the provisions of the act or the rules or regulations thereunder, and contracts made prior to the enactment of the act which involve the continuance of any relationship or practice prohibited by the act or any rule or regulation thereunder.

(c) This subsection includes provisions to negative any construction of the act which would affect the validity of loans and liens in certain cases. Cases are specified in which the act is to be construed to afford a defense to the collection of any debt or obligation or the enforcement of a lien.

SECTION 29. FOREIGN SECURITIES EXCHANGES

(a) This subsection makes it unlawful for brokers or dealers to use the mails or any instrumentality of interstate commerce to effect upon an exchange outside the United States transactions in securities of issuers who reside in or are organized under the laws of, or have their principal place of business in, the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, in contravention of the rules and regulations of the Commission.

(b) It is provided that the act shall not apply to any person insofar as he transacts a business in securities outside the jurisdiction of the United States unless he transacts such business in contravention of the rules and regulations of the Commission prescribed to prevent evasion of the act.

SECTION 30. REGISTRATION FEES

An annual registration fee for exchanges is provided for in this section. Such fee is to be an amount equal to one five-hundredth of 1 percent of the aggregate dollar amount of the securities sales transacted on the exchange during the preceding calendar year. Amounts received as fees will be deposited in the Federal Treasury.

SECTION 31. MEMBERS AND EMPLOYEES OF FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

(a) This subsection provides for two additional members of the Federal Trade Commission. It authorizes the Commission to divide the members thereof into divisions (each to consist of not less than three members) and to direct that any of its functions arising under this act or any other provision of law may be assigned or referred to any such division. Provision is made for rehearing before the full Commission of decisions, orders, or other action by a division. A rehearing is not to suspend the operation of that division unless the Commission makes an order to that effect.

(b) For the purposes of this act and of the Securities Act of 1933 the Commission is authorized to employ and fix the compensation of attorneys, examiners, and other special experts without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to the employment and compensation of officers and employees of the United States.

SECTION 32. PENALTIES

Penalties are provided for willful violation of the act or any rule or regulation thereunder the violation of which is expressly made unlawful, or for the making or causing to be made any statement in any application, report, or document filed under the act if such statement is false or misleading with respect to any material fact The penalty provided is a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 2 years, or both, except that when the violation is by an exchange a fine not to exceed $500,000 may be imposed.

SECTION 33. SEPARABILITY OF PROVISIONS

This section declares the policy of Congress that if any provision of the act or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance is held invalid the remainder of the act or the application of such provision to persons or circumstances other than those to which it is held invalid shall not be affected thereby.

SECTION 34. EFFECTIVE DATE

The act is to take effect upon its enactment, except that certain of its provisions are to become effective July 1, 1934, and certain other provisions are to become effective on August 1, 1934.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT].

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I repeat what has been already said in appreciation of the work of our committee, which reported this bill, and particularly the immense amount of work our chairman, Mr. RAYBURN, has done. I think you will perceive from his remarks that at times he was a little worn by the number of people who wanted to see him, and by letters and telegrams he received. That is not strange. You will also agree, I think, that all the Members of Congress—I know it is true of all the members of the committee—have received an enormous number of telegrams and letters regarding the bill.

The chairman has characterized, and I suppose stigmatized all those communications as propaganda, but I think that if you have in mind the fact that by the best estimates we can get there are some 10,000,000 separate stockholders in the United States, and also that this bill directly and indirectly may affect every one of those 10,000,000 people, you will perceive why the bill has created a tremendous amount of interest throughout the United States and why the people have written in to their Congressmen.

I do not believe that the bulk of these communications have been brought about by anything except a legitimate desire of the people to protect their own property against undue depreciation.

It seems to me that it is not quite fair to the stockholders, these people seeking to protect their interests, to impute their action to unfair motives. I never have heard any objection to the farmers getting together to protect their own interests.

You doubtless appreciate that in the past 50 years the amount of liquid personal property in stocks and bonds in this country has increased tremendously, and very much to the advantage of the people of this country.

You will agree, I think, also, that while the so-called "panic of 1929" was largely connected with this personal property, and that while the blow-up was more evident on the stock exchange than anywhere else, the stock exchange was not primarily to blame.

You know, as any well-informed man knows, that these speculative eras and collapses afterward have been with us ever since civilization began and people have been possessed of personal property.

You will appreciate that stock exchanges have done a tremendous amount of good. If it had not been for the stock exchanges, which make capital liquid, which enable men to realize quickly on their holdings, the distress of the collapse would have been much greater.

You will all agree that more frozen assets of this country have been connected with real estate than they have with stocks.

I personally have not had very much business with the stock exchange, but I have known a great many people who have. I know that the New York Stock Exchange—that is credited with more of the evils than all the rest of them put together—I know that the business ethics are higher on that exchange than in the average business. It is conducted by word of mouth, and on honor, and violations of that honor are very rare.

I am not saying that there have not been abuses that should be corrected. What I am pleading for here is that in considering this legislation it should not be undertaken in any vindictive spirit. It should not be conducted with a notion that anybody who has made or may make a suggestion concerning the bill has been actuated by anything but an honest motive, and not by any propaganda.

In my own case, coming from New England, I have not been so much interested in the great corporations whose stocks are traded in on the New York Stock Exchange, and which become part of these great speculative movements, as I have in the smaller corporations and manufacturers who exist throughout New England and throughout the United States in general. I have not been so concerned with the regulation of stock-exchange practices, and I have not, as I said in my minority views, specially criticized the bill as a stock-exchange regulative bill, but I am concerned that the Commission which is set up under the bill should have such tremendous power over every manufacturing corporation and almost every other form of corporation in the country, and should have such tremendous power to regulate the care and management of these billions of liquid property in the United States.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. RICH. I was under the impression from what the chairman of the committee, Mr. RAYBURN, said a few moments ago, that the smaller businesses were not affected by this bill if they did not deal on the listed-stock exchanges.

Mr. MERRITT. That is partly true, but the fact of the matter is that the Commission under this bill still has the power to force every corporation into some stock exchange. It also has the power to exempt them, and that was put in for the relief of these smaller corporations, and I think it is a very valuable feature of the bill, but, nonetheless, it is true that the Commission could act so that those small businesses would be bound to register on some exchange.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. I rise to accentuate the statement of the gentleman that the Federal Trade Commission really can control and regulate the corporation whose securities are not on any listed exchange. Is not that so?

Mr. MERRITT. Rather indirectly, I think. I think it may make regulations which would force the small corporations to register their securities if the Commission so desired.

Mr. BRITTEN. Could it not also make regulations which would more or less limit their credit?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. And in the limitation of their credit they would have to do what the Commission required?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. So that the Commission could indirectly, under the bill, control every industry in the United States if it wanted to.

Mr. MERRITT. It could control the business in its securities.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. I believe the gentleman stated that the Commission could force these different businesses into the exchange?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. Could it force the exchange to accept them? If it has the right to force the different businesses into an exchange, can it force the exchange to accept the different business interests?

Mr. MERRITT. It can force an exchange to become a national exchange if it wants to. It can exempt from the effects of the bill the smaller exchanges.

Mr. BLOOM. The exchange today needs to accept the different business interests it wants to list on the exchange. Is not that right?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. Suppose the exchange refuses to accept the business interests that the Commission would force into the exchange.

Mr. MERRITT. It could not do that, because they have to come in under general rules, and the general rules of all exchanges are subject to the Commission.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. I dislike to interrupt my friend, but the question which has been propounded to the gentleman from Connecticut is so vital and the country is so much interested in the question and the answer that I feel I should say that I do not interpret the bill as giving the Federal Trade Commission power to compel any corporation to list on any exchange.

Mr. MERRITT. Not directly; no.

Mr. MAPES. And the only provision in the bill that relates to small or local corporations in that respect, as I understand it, is the one in the over-the-counter market section, which gives the Federal Trade Commission authority in its regulations of the dealers and brokers in the over-the-counter markets to require that such dealers and brokers cease to handle the securities of any corporation unless they are listed with them, but in no case is a corporation required to so list unless it sees fit to do so. I say again I beg the gentleman's pardon for interrupting him, but I think this is a very vital feature of the bill.

Mr. MERRITT. I think what I said before is correct, that the Commission could not do it directly; but I think if the bill is carefully read the gentleman will find that if the Commission starts out to do it by indirection it could either do that or else fix it so that the stock of any particular company could not be used as collateral, and would be very much depreciated.

Mr. THOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. THOM. Could the gentleman point out the particular sections in which he says this could be done?

Mr. MERRITT. It is in several sections, but I could not take time to do that in detail. The gentleman will either have to take my statement, or the statement of someone else.

Mr. THOM. I do not question the gentleman's statement. I wanted to refer to the language; that is all.

Mr. MERRITT. I am sorry, but I have not the time to take it up in detail. All the measures which have been taken by the administration in connection with this question have been in the first place to relieve the distress and in the second place to relieve the depression. Undoubtedly some good results have followed, but not in all cases. We hear great dissatisfaction with the A.A.A. and a good deal over the N.R.A. The one certain result of all these measures, which I am not intending to criticize at all, has been an enormous increase in the public debt, which the President estimates at the end of the fiscal year 1935 will amount to over three thousand million dollars, with an annual interest charge of one thousand million dollars.

Now, in order that these temporary measures may really be temporary, it is, of course, essential that business should be revived. There are some signs now of revived business. My impression is that if the Nation could be assured of quiet, business would of itself revive on a sound foundation, which can only come from individual initiative and individual work. It is universally agreed also that the only sound foundation for reviving business must be in the purchase of capital goods; that is, goods for future useful work. All these enormous expenditures on public buildings produce demand for the material which goes into the buildings, but after the buildings are constructed they do not add to employment except in the care of the buildings, and they do add to the expense of maintenance by the Government.

Now, for the purchase of capital goods, and indeed for business in general, the first essential is confidence. It is very generally thought by business men and writers on economics that the Security Registration Act which was passed at the last session of this Congress has been very detrimental. It had a great many severe provisions with regard to underwriters, with regard to directors, and putting on them responsibilities and liabilities which drove a great many of them out of business and prevented new securities being issued. I do not mean to say that the lack of issuing new securities has been altogether due to that act, but I do say it has been a large factor. In this act we should be careful not to overdo it. The difficulty with all acts like this is that those who write them are so intent on punishing a few guilty people that they overlook the fact that they are really punishing still more, a greater percentage of honest people. In all corporations there are a certain number of selfish men who will endeavor to feather their own nests at the expense of the corporation or of their fellow stockholders, but, after all, those men are a very small percentage. The time has not yet come when great corporations or any corporations can get along without character and without brains. The difficulty with the Securities Registration Act and with this act, to my mind, is that it is so filled with directions and regulations which are indefinite and uncertain, and cannot be enforced. That was illustrated, for instance, by the colloquy between the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] and myself. We have both been working on this bill for weeks, and the gentleman from Michigan thinks it produces one result and I think it produces another. There can be no doubt that the result from the Securities Registration Act, and the result from this act, will be that responsible people, a great many thousands of directors of corporations, will be forced out of those corporations. These men go on boards of directors not because they want to but because they are known in their communities, and their services are sought after because they are men of judgment and character. Such men are not going on those boards to make money on the stock, and if by going on a board of directors they are going to subject themselves to suits by any blackmailer that comes along, they will not go on. The result is that the corporation will not be formed or you will have boards of directors and managements not as able as you would wish.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MERRITT. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. Undoubtedly there is considerable opinion in the House for a change in the bill which grants this authority to the Federal Trade Commission. Many Members of the House, and I am one of them, would like to see a different form of commission set up, by the enactment of legislation. I am wondering if the gentleman contemplates presenting an amendment that, for instance, would provide a commission composed of a member of the Federal Reserve Board, a member of the Federal Trade Commission, and one or two members from the stock exchange, members who would know all about this very complicated machinery which operates the exchanges?

Mr. MERRITT. The gentleman perhaps knows that the bill as reported by the Senate committee provides for a separate commission.

Mr. BRITTEN. The Senate bill provides for a purely political commission, three Democrats and two Republicans.

Mr. MERRITT. I think so.

Mr. BRITTEN. My thought is that that would be just as bad as the provisions in this act now before the House. I have been much impressed with the testimony before the gentleman's committee, to the effect that a distinctly nonpartisan, nonpolitical commission of some sort should be established, and there should be upon that commission one or two men who know every angle of the operations of the stock exchanges of this country.

Mr. MERRITT. I agree with the gentleman, and if he will allow me, I will give him better authority than perhaps either he or I, for that statement. This whole legislation came from a commission which was appointed by President Roosevelt and headed by Mr. Dickinson, who is Assistant Secretary of Commerce. That commission made a report, and this bill follows that report. I regret to say that Mr. Dickinson was not a member of the committee which drew the bill, but his letter to the President, which finally resulted in the drawing of the bill, has this phrase:

> Should it be determined that a separate commission should be set up, such commission should be composed of at least three members without regard to political affiliations, appointed for a term of at least 7 years.

Now, this is the point:

> In either case it is suggested that one of the members of the commission or authority should be required by law to be a man thoroughly experienced in stock-exchange practices.

I think the longer the committee considered this bill the more the members were impressed with the feeling of its enormous importance and the enormous interests which will be affected by the bill.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. I yield.

Mr. BEEDY. Is the gentleman going to offer an amendment embracing the suggestions made by the gentleman from Illinois and Mr. DICKINSON?

Mr. MERRITT. I think it will be offered. I do not know that I shall offer it.

Mr. BEEDY. Is there such amendment to be offered, within your knowledge?

Mr. MERRITT. I think it should be.

Mr. BEEDY. I think it should be, too; but I wanted to know whether anybody representing the committee can tell me whether there is such an amendment to be presented.

Mr. BULWINKLE. The gentleman refers to the separate authority or commission?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes; I am going to offer such an amendment.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina to state to the House the substance of the amendment the gentleman proposes to offer?

Mr. BULWINKLE. In substance it will empower the President to appoint 3 men to serve for 2, 4, and 6 years, 2 of one political party and 1 of another.

Mr. BRITTEN. If the gentleman from Connecticut will yield further, my thought is that instead of the President naming three gentlemen of the political parties—and, of course, any commissioner named by the President would be a high type of man—that at least one member of the commission should be thoroughly qualified and experienced in the manipulations of the stock exchanges.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Answering the gentleman from Illinois, I may say that I do not think any President ought to be tied down to the selection of a man from any certain group.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does not the gentleman think it would be wise to suggest in the legislation that at least one man should be thoroughly experienced in the manipulation of stock exchanges?

Mr. BULWINKLE. No; I do not.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, I submit this matter can be cleared up in debate without using too much of my time.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman stated that the Securities Act was handicapping industry in obtaining loans; and the gentleman's position on this stock-exchange bill, as I understood it, will further aggravate that condition.

Mr. MERRITT. I did not mean to say in obtaining loans. What I said was that the Securities Act and this act will retard good men from going on boards of directors.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it not a fact that it makes it difficult for companies to finance their present needs by the issue of securities?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes; I think it does.

Mr. CULKIN. And is it not also a fact that at the present time it is difficult, if not almost impossible, for an industry of normal size to get loans from banks?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. This act has nothing to do with the original issue of securities?

Mr. MERRITT. No; it only aggravates the difficulty; that is all.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. I yield for a short question.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. The gentleman remarked that it was difficult to get good men to serve on boards of directors.

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. The gentleman predicates that statement upon the fact that members of boards are held responsible for the activities of their corporations?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Therefore, the director who does not attend to business on the board becomes a bad man instead of a good man, and ought to be kept off the board.

Mr. MERRITT. Well, that is a little casuistry into which I will not go.

In closing I call the attention of the committee to the letter of the President addressed to the chairman of our committee on March 26, in which the President said in the paragraph summing up his letter:

> We must, of course, prevent insofar as possible manipulation of prices to the detriment of actual investors; but at the same time we must eliminate unnecessary, unwise, and destructive speculation.

This sentence, you see, applies to stock-exchange practices. I cannot criticize the provisions of this bill in that regard especially, but I do think the bill goes beyond the expressed sentiments of the President. I think it will tend to continue the unsettled state of mind of business men and manufacturers so that they will not be willing to make forward contracts; they will not be willing to buy capital goods and contract to furnish capital goods because they cannot tell at what moment the Commission may decide to change its rules, may decide to put some increased burden on their corporation, may decide to make some new regulation of the stock exchanges which will freeze what ought to be their liquid assets.

This bill has been drawn with the greatest care; and I suppose that with the knowledge we have now it may be considered a good bill to cover these subjects, if we want to cover them; but I still doubt if there is a man on our committee who has been studying this subject who would be willing to say with certainty what the bill will do in very many directions.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MERRITT. I think, therefore, the part of wisdom, as I have suggested in the minority report, would be to allow this bill to sleep. Perfect it by debate, yes; give the Members an opportunity to debate, to state their own opinions, and hear the opinions of others, but allow the enactment of the bill to wait until the next Congress. It is only 7 months before another Congress will meet; and, surely, nothing is going to happen in that time; there is not going to be any destructive speculation. I think it will be the part of much greater wisdom to let the bill go over another 6 months instead of risking the enactment of a bad law which will be difficult to remove from the statute books once it is enacted.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. I understood the gentleman to say that the ethics of the business of the country were not as high as the ethics of the New York Stock Exchange. Is that correct?

Mr. MERRITT. No; that is not what I said, although I did say practically that. I said that business as conducted on the New York Stock Exchange is conducted on a higher and better ethical standard than many other businesses.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman, of course, has read the investigation of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee along that line?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. What can the gentleman say with regard to his comparison in view of what was developed by that committee?

Mr. MERRITT. The report of the Senate committee related to a very few individuals on an exchange.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman said that the national debt will reach something more than $30,000,000,000. I would like to know how much of that is actual and how much is in the form of revolving funds that will come back to the Government?

Mr. MERRITT. I cannot answer questions of detail and they do not affect my point.

Mr. KELLER. I have been trying to find that out.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss in detail the provisions of this bill, but rather to touch upon a few matters which have occurred to me during its consideration in the committee as being extraordinarily important.
